BERLIN, Dec. 18 (AP).—A movement against excessive advertising over the radio is under way in Germany. Spokesmen for the newly organized Radio Protective Association, an organization of listeners-in, hint that the time may come when a radio strike will be declared against the Government. Since each fan pays a license fee of 50 cents a month, such a move would force attention through loss of revenue to the Government.

KEMAL HAD VISION IN BUILDING ANGORA

But Turkish Engineers, Halted by Funds, Fail to Get Water to New Capital.

CITY REBUILT IN DESERT

Location Was Chosen Far From Stamboul to Avoid the Old Influences of the Sultans.

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ANGORA, Nov. 28.—In the Arabian Nights there is no more fantastic story than that of Angora, the new capital of the New Turkey. As a political conception it deserves to rank among the most remarkable phenomena in the history of the world. If it succeeds it will be sublime; if it fails it will at least be entitled to attention as an example of a great effort to uplift a people.

Mustapha Kemal Pasha is the Moses of his nation. He is pointing out a new land of promise. He is trying to work miracles, to enhearten the doubtful. Nor is he an Aaron. He wields no rod which, at his will, will burst into bloom or cause fresh waters to gush from the solid rock. Yet he hopes to make a garden in the arid plateau if Anatolia, and he is tapping the sources of a distant lake to furnish Angora with a water supply adequate to all its needs. When fountains play in the squares of Angora, Mustapha Kemal Pasha's dream will be on the way to realization.

One has to see Angora as it is now to obtain even a vague idea of the difficulties which lie in the way. From Scutari, on the Asiatic shore of the Bosporus, the train runs for some hours alongside the Sea of Marmora.

The land is fertile, and the villages look prosperous despite their ramshackle buildings and their general aspect of dirtiness. As the sun sinks in the west the eyes are feasted with a succession of such color schemes as would tempt many a painter to smash his palette.

The passenger retiring to his wagon-lit is pleasantly surprised to find that the accommodations on this Constantinople-to-Angora train are much better than those on the Orient Express from Vienna to Constantinople. The coaches are newer and the upholsterings and other furnishings fresher. But it is on awakening in the morning that the traveler gets a real surprise. Instead of the magic beauty of the Bosporus and Marmora the train winds slowly through a country which is removed from being a desert only by the fact that here and there it is under cultivation—the sort of cultivation that man was capable of giving to the land a thousand years ago. Here there is no modern agricultural machinery, and nitrates, natural or synthetic, are unknown. One sees a sparse peasantry at work with their ox-drawn, primeval plows. Trees there are none, and what the flocks of sheep, seen from time to time, can find to graze upon in these sun-baked wastes of rocky and sandy soil does not readily meet the eye. The nearer to Angora the more barren becomes the country.

Capital Astonishes the Visitor.

Within a few miles of the capital, however, one gets a glimpse of something which is actually astounding. A series of newly-erected buildings appear, some of which are residential and some resembling barns and shippons. On inquiry it is learned that this is "The Ghazi's model farm." Mustapha Kemal Pasha is here attempting to give an object lesson—trying to show the Anatolian farmer what he may arrive at, in time. One is almost staggered by the thought of what processes will be required before an almost primeval peasantry is able to adapt itself to the modern methods of agriculture displayed at this model farm; and also one wonders how it will be possible to supply the willing worker with the costly implements needed.

Before the traveler has quite recovered from his astonishment at the daring character of this experimental effort to transform a wilderness, he has reached Angora.

Seen from the station, the new capital of the Republic of Turkey is picturesque enough. About a mile away a hill—a rock, rather—rises abruptly out of the plain. It is crowned by a wall and bastions of medieval appearance. At the foot, and on the slopes of the surrounding lower hills, there are structures old and new. Most of the former look as if they were tumbling into ruins and many of the latter are unfinished.

Away to the right is a rather imposing building of which the two wings are white, while the central part of the edifice is topped by a dome which is black. This is the National Museum of the Republic. The dome was originally gilded, but for some reason or other, the gilt has been taken off the gingerbread; it will be renewed when funds are available. It is because funds are just at present running short that so many of the new structures remain incomplete.

Further acquaintance with the town forces an acknowledgment that what has been accomplished bespeaks an extraordinary and even marvelous endeavor. Before Angora became the national capital it was the chief town of the province in which it is situated. It had a population of from 5,000 to 20,000 souls. The Turkish authorities are widely at variance in their estimates of what used to be the number of inhabitants. They are more exact in regard to the total of the present population, which is generally put at 80,000. Whatever the real difference may be between the old and the new census, it has come about within less than five years—a circumstance surprising enough in itself.

Changed by One Man.

How much more surprising when it is considered that the change is due entirely to the initiative of one man!

Mustapha Kemal Pasha made Angora the national capital for two reasons, one strategic the other political. Angora in his view was, and would be always, impregnable. That is a question which military experts may be left to decide. From a political viewpoint, his design was to remove the official headquarters of the New Turkey as far as possible from the influences of Constantinople. To the new Turk Stamboul is a symptom of decay and dissolution.

The Sultans ruled all the provinces of their empire white in order to embellish the city in which they dwelt. Nothing was done for the provinces with the money collected from them. Abdul Hamid spent millions in adding to Yildiz Kiosque an extension in which to house the then German Kaiser when he paid his memorable visit to Constantinople. This extension has now become a gambling hall, in which the foreign population of Pera and Stamboul is permitted to contribute its money to a cagnotte from which the revenues of the country will derive some benefit. Turks are not permitted to play there, although as a matter of fact the prohibition is more honored in the breach than the observance.

Mustapha Kemal Pasha's idea is, in a measure, to reverse the system which prevailed under the imperial régime, and to make Constantinople shed some of its (in his view ill-gotten) wealth for the benefit of the provinces.

Angora is being set up as a sign and symbol of this new dispensation. Huge sums have already been expended. Much vaster sums will have to be spent before the practical demonstration is complete. As yet it is impossible to determine whether Mustapha Kemal is a wild visionary, or whether his conception, magnificent as it undoubtedly is in its essential idea of creating in the very heart of Turkey a centre from which the national life can draw inspiration and strength, can be brought to a practical realization.

I find a very decided conflict of opinion on the point among those who from opportunities for observation possess the best means of forming a judgment. Among the Turks themselves—at any rate those I met in Angora—there is almost unanimity of opinion. They point with exultant pride to what has been already accomplished. They minimize their failures on the ground of inexperience.

That Angora does not already rejoice in playing fountains and sanitary freshets is, in their view, only a trifling accident due to the fact that their engineers, to whom was entrusted the work of bringing to the city the waters of a lake only thirty-odd kilometers away, made some slight miscalculations which, in course of time, will be easily remedied. If there are in Angora any Turks who harbor a suspicion that foreign engineers would have been more expert they are not vocal.

Under these circumstances, foreign observers are probably the best judges. Among them optimists and pessimists are found pretty equally divided.

"I have a high admiration for the ideals for which Mustapha Kemal is striving," said one of them, "and if any man can succeed he will. But he is engaged in a struggle against nature."

"I see no reason why he should fail," said another. "All that is required is water and vegetation. The water can be got, and with a system of afforestation carefully and thoroughly applied, many parts of Anatolia that are now waste land can be transformed into fertile country. Our American goldenrod could be made to serve a very useful purpose here."

Goldenrod Would Hold Dust.

This suggestion of the use of goldenrod was, I take it, made with particular application to the dust, which is in some respects the most characteristic feature of Angora and the surrounding country. The first glimpse of Angora is through a haze which, on closer contact, is found to be clouds of a fine dust which fills the eyes and mouth and nostrils and hangs on like a shirt of Nessus.

There is only one thing about Angora, I was told, that is worse than its dust; and that is its mud. I had no personal experience of the latter, for it does not often rain at Angora.

When I left it the sun was setting, and the city was bathed in a glory of warm light. Every window was an illumination. The old walls were resonate and the new structures were resplendent. One forgot dust and dirt and many other things even more unpleasant in the contemplation of what was a revelation of sheer beauty; and however one might doubt, he hoped that Mustapha Kemal's dream might come true, and that this city on the hill would in time become a symbol of regeneration and a beacon of hope to the people for whom he is seeking to make a New Turkey. And that is another story.

AUSTRIA HONORS KREISLER.

Gives Violinist Medal for Aiding Country's Starving Children.

BERLIN, Dec. 18 (AP).—Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, has received a medal in recognition of his benefactions to starving Austrian children.

The medal, which bears Kreisler's picture on the side and an allegorical figure of music on the other, was presented during his only concert of the season in the German capital.

The presentation was made by Dr. Felix Frank, the Austrian Minister to Germany, on behalf of the Austrian Aid Society. The medal was designed by Arthur Loewental, Berlin sculptor, and a copy has been acquired by the Kaiser Friedrich Museum.

With Mrs. Kreisler, who is the former Harriet Lies of New York, the violinist has started a fund for the support of needy students at Berlin University.

CITY'S CHRISTMAS TO BE A HEARTY ONE

Abundant Parties and Gifts for the Poor Will Feature the Holiday Celebrations.

RAIL TRAVEL TO BE HEAVY

Roads to Canada Expect Unusually Large Business—Mails Already Feeling the Strain.

The celebration of Christmas and the holiday week leading to New Year's Day promises this year to be unusually wide and hearty. All the old standbys who annually take care of the poor are ready to start their tasks, and reports from the department stores indicate that gift-buying has been very heavy.

Railroads report that advance bookings for the back-home holiday travel has been large and the postoffice is already beginning to feel the strain of the yearly burden that piles up. Reiterating his oft-made plea to "mail early," Postmaster Kiely announced yesterday that rural free delivery routes would not function on Christmas Day.

"Parcels for patrons of rural routes," he said, "should be mailed now so as to reach the postoffice of delivery before Christmas. There is no objection to placing on Christmas packages the words, 'Please do not open until Christmas' or other inscription to that effect. Begin to mail your Christmas greeting cards now. A Christmas greeting received after Christmas is like a flower without fragrance."

The railways which operate to Canadian points anticipate particularly heavy travel across the border for the holidays this year. Thousands of Canadian residents in the United States will travel back to their former homes, and in addition a great many Americans are expected to go to the Dominion to take part in the Winter sports or participate in the festivities of the Christmas season.

Seen Record Travel to Canada.

"I anticipate a record movement of passengers to Canadian points this year," said F. A. Young, General Eastern Passenger Agent of the Canadian National Railways. "Reports from all of our offices in this district indicate that an unusually large number of persons on this side of the line will eat their Christmas dinner in Canada this year. Requests for accommodations on the Montrealer, one of the regular trains to Montreal, have been coming in during the last few days in large numbers in our offices here and in Philadelphia. This train has through cars to Ottawa and Quebec in addition to Montreal, and apparently the Winter sports in these three cities are attracting many Americans."

A message from A. B. Chown, in charge of the Canadian National offices in the Detroit-Chicago district, reported:

"It looks as though the Christmas travel movement to Canada from Detroit will be larger this year than ever before. To take care of these additional passengers extra trains will be run from Detroit via Port Huron to Toronto and other cities in Eastern Canada. Two of these extra trains will leave on Dec. 23 and four on Dec. 24. Extra sections on regular trains out of Chicago will be run."

Legion to Aid the Needy.

Twenty-five American Legion Posts in New York County have undertaken the task of providing Christmas "with trimmings" for 600 children and 1,600 men. The men are patients in eight United States Veterans' hospitals, extending from northern New York to Arizona. The children are dependents of adults being assisted by the Welfare Committee of the Legion. Christmas for the 600 children will begin today with a party at the Washington Irving High School. Two hundred dolls, dressed by women employes of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, will be distributed. The New York American and the Salvation Army will provide a dinner for each of the 300 families expected.

The Horn & Hardart Employes' Relief Association will hold a children's Christmas party at 3 P. M. today at 1,370 Broadway. Challis Gore, a guest at the Hotel Majestic, will hold his annual Christmas party in the Glow Room of the hotel from 2 P. M. to 6 P. M. Dinner baskets, weighing forty pounds, will go to 100 families, and presents to the children.

About 300 children who are patients in the Metropolitan Hospital, Welfare Island; the Sea View Hospital on Staten Island, and the Kings County Hospital, Brooklyn, will be the guests tomorrow of S. S. Rosen of 500 Fifth Avenue and his associates. The children will come by boat to the pier at East Eighty-sixth Street, arriving at 9 A. M. and then go to Wanamaker's, where gifts will be distributed. At 11 A. M. they will assemble in the upstairs dining room of Drake's Restaurant, West Forty-third Street, near Sixth Avenue, to enjoy a Christmas dinner. Santa Claus's deputy will be Welfare Commissioner Bird A. Coler, aided by Representative-elect William W. Cohen and others. The children will see the Hippodrome show in the afternoon.

Mayor May Speak at Rally.

Mayor Walker is expected to speak at the Christmas tree rally of the American Woman's Association tomorrow night at 8 o'clock in the grand ballroom of the Hotel Plaza. Other speakers will include Miss Elisabeth Marbury, Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Robinson Smith, Miss Julia Arthur and Walter S. Trumbull. Christmas carols will be sung by the choir of St. George's Episcopal Church, led by H. T. Burleigh. Dr. Sigmund Spaeth will present "Songs You Forgot to Remember."

On Tuesday at 1 P. M. the American Criterion Society will give a Christmas party for the kindergarten children of the society's school in the Church of All Nations, 9 Second Avenue.

Wall Street groups as usual will play the role of Santa Claus to thousands of children living in the shadows of the financial canyons. The activities will be inaugurated on Tuesday afternoon when the Bankers Trust Company will act as host to the nursery charges of the Bowling Green Neighborhood Association.

On Wednesday 500 children will be entertained in two parties of 250 each at the Bowling Green Neighborhood House, 105 Washington Street. The Curb Market's Christmas party will be held on Friday afternoon. Between 1,500 and 2,000 children are expected. On Dec. 28 the Bowling Green association will give an invitation dance for the young people of lower Manhattan. On Dec. 31 at 2:30 P. M. 2,000 children will be guests at the party of the Produce Exchange.

Y. M. C. A. Has Extensive Program.

The program of the Y. M. C. A. for Christmas is extensive. The association will install a tree in Broad Street opposite the New York Stock Exchange, where the Christmas celebration will be rung in by the Trinity chimes at noon on Thursday. Music will be furnished by the band of the Sixteenth Infantry, and community singing will follow. The tree will be illuminated beginning at 5 P. M. In all branches of the association there will be celebrations and a program of entertainment for the army prisoners in Castle William, Governors Island, will be staged under the direction of "Mother" Davidson, sister of Daniel Frohman, on Thursday afternoon.

On Thursday at 4:30 the Brooklyn Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children will hold a party for children at 105 Schermerhorn Street, Brooklyn. A Punch and Judy show and a magician will be part of the entertainment.

The Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce in cooperation with The Brooklyn Eagle will hold a community celebration in front of the Borough Hall on Friday at 2 P. M. There will be speeches by Borough President James J. Byrne, Ralph Jonas, Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Rabbi Lyons, Dr. H. Neumann and the Rev. W. F. McGinnis. Brooklyn schools will be dismissed at noon to permit the children to participate. Special music will be rendered by the Elks Glee Club, Edison Glee Club, The Chaminade, the Choral Society of Abraham & Straus, and the Park Slope Choral. The Todd Marine Band will play.

Colonel Edward J. Parker announced that the plans of the Salvation Army included distribution of Christmas dinners to 25,000 persons and toys to 5,000 children. The dinners and the gifts will be dispensed at twenty-four places in Manhattan, Brooklyn, the Bronx and Staten Island. The food will be sufficient to provide three meals for a family of five persons.

Plans at the Navy Yard.

Preparations for the celebration of Christmas are under way at the Navy Yard, Brooklyn, under the direction of several committees from various warships, the American Red Cross and the Knights of Columbus. On board the Seattle, the flagship of Admiral Charles A. Hughes, Commander-in-Chief of the United States Fleet, a Christmas tree will be set up and a dinner will be served to 100 children from the neighborhood of the yard. An entertainment will be furnished by members of the crew and after the youngsters are shown over the Seattle each will be presented with a $2 order for merchandise on a Brooklyn department store. The Salvation Army will nominate the children. The Seattle committee in charge will consist of Captain Charles Freeman, Commander Charles W. Crosse and Lieut. Commander R. Barber. On board the receiving ship Pueblo, 125 children of enlisted men will be dined and entertained by the crew. Captain William B. Wells of the Pueblo is directing the arrangements.

Another feature at the Navy Yard will be dinner to the 500 patients in the Naval Hospital and an entertainment for them under auspices of committees from the Red Cross and the Knights of Columbus. The 200 marines on duty in the yard and the 1,500 men in the crews of other vessels tied up there will celebrate Christmas in their own quarters.

The Christmas carols sung at the Riverside "Tree of Light," in Riverside Park at 119th Street, will be repeated this year at 4:30 next Sunday afternoon by a chorus of 150 voices from the International House.

SANTA USES A PLANE.

Opens Westchester Celebration With Party at Port Chester.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Dec. 18.—Westchester County started its Christmas celebration a week ahead of time, when Santa Claus arrived at Port Chester this afternoon in an airplane, his trip being made under the auspices of the Port Chester Chamber of Commerce and the Recreation Commission. A party for some 500 children was held at Recreation Hall after Santa had circled the village in his plane.

Santa's arrival was the first of a series of events to be staged as part of a community observance of Christmas by the village of Port Chester, the second being the illumination of the community "tree of lights" tonight.

Other municipalities in Westchester to have community trees are Mount Vernon, Tuckahoe, New Rochelle, Larchmont and in Hawthorne. The White Plains Chamber of Commerce played Santa Claus this morning to about 1,500 children who are in various institutions in and near this city. Dolls will be distributed to about 250 girls who are also inmates of institutions here.

In Yonkers a festival will be held on Christmas Eve at the John Burroughs illuminated tree in South Yonkers by the members of the John Burroughs Garden Club.

Christmas observances at various public institutions in Westchester County will also commence tomorrow.

DRIVE AGAINST 'XMAS' IS CALLED TRIVIAL

Princeton Clergymen Hold Use of the Word Does Not Constitute Irreverence.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Dec. 18.—Members of the Faculty of the Princeton Theological Seminary find little objection to the abbreviation of the word Christmas. Interviews with several clergymen on the Faculty of the seminary revealed that the use of "Xmas" was not considered irreverent, as it was by several New York clergymen. According to a recent report, Dr. Geerhardus Vos, Professor of Biblical Theology, thinks the matter is "to small to be discussed." However, he does not favor the present method of celebrating Christmas.

"I am not in favor of the Pagan idea of Christmas which is observed today among non-churchgoing people," he said. "The old Holland method of observance of two separate days, Christmas for religious worship, and St. Nicks for the joviality which is entirely associated with Christmas today, should be resumed."

Asked to comment on the abbreviation of the word, Dr. Robert Dick Wilson, expert in paleography, said:

"It is not at all a matter of reverence. I always use 'X' in shorthand when referring to Christ. Does that mean that I am irreverent? The discussion is both senseless and useless, since all nations have used signs to denote the Diety. For example, in Genesis II and in Hebrew of Ecclesiastics the Jews have used an abbreviation for Jehovah. Abbreviated forms for God are contained in the Greek New Testament. If you have been in the habit of using a circle to represent God, is it wrong that you continue using a circle? Our whole system of writing is being absurdly attacked. The clergymen who are responsible for this unwonted resurrection are to be deplored for their lack of taste."

J. Ross Stevenson, President of the seminary, said that "Christmas" was to be preferred on account of the dignity, but he did not believe that any irreverence was intended in the shorter term.

Dr. Charles R. Erdman, Professor of Practical Theology and Moderator of the Presbyterian Church last year, expressed surprise that so minute a matter could capture public attention while there were many affairs of tremendous importance in the background. "However, if the campaign is conducted quietly for the abolition of 'Xmas' I favor such a move. 'Christmas' lends more dignity to the event than the abbreviated 'Xmas,'" he said.

Dr. William Park Armstrong, Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis, took issue with the campaign of the New York clergy, saying "It is rather silly to make the affair so serious."

ART STUDENTS ELECT.

Officers Named in Cooper Union Architectural Classes.

Election of officers of the four classes of the Architectural Drawing Department of the Night Art School was announced at Cooper Union yesterday. Heads of the Student Branch of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers were also named.

The new four-year officers are: President, Carl F. Rumph; Vice President, Raymond L. Rochlin; Secretary, Nat. T. Bromberg; Treasurer, Vincent J. Buchner.

Thomas G. McLaughlin of Jersey City was chosen President of the Junior Class. Other Junior officers are: Vice President, Arthur W. Thiel; Secretary, Douglas F. Thomson; Treasurer, George S. Napoli.

The Sophomore officers are headed by Frank A. Muller, President, and Charles L. Dellon, Vice President. Milton Goldsmith is Secretary, and Albert J. Legurori, Treasurer.

The first year class elected Alexander McGlimpsey as President; Helen W. Kress, Vice President; William C. Mackay, Secretary, and U. S. Williams, Treasurer.

SLEIGH GOES THROUGH ICE.

Canadian Couple and Child Drown in Upper Ottawa River.

PEMBROKE, Ontario, Dec. 18 (AP).—A husband and wife and their six-year-old child were drowned when the cutter in which they were riding plunged through a hole in the ice on the Upper Ottawa River near here. The bodies were identified as Mr. and Mrs. John McGuire and their child, from Demers Centre.

The family was returning from Christmas shopping in Pembroke and it is believed drove into the hole while blinded by driving snow.

SANTA LETTER TO ONTARIO.

People of Northland Will Try to Meet Texas Child's Request.

SAULT STE. MARIE, Ont., Dec. 18 (AP).—Northland (Ont.) residents will endeavor to inform Santa Claus of the requests of a little admirer in Houston, Texas, who addressed a Yuletide letter to the venerable gentleman at his home in "Northland, Canada."

If Santa Claus fails to find the chimney of his little friend in Houston, it will be no fault of the United States and Canadian postal employes, as the missive was duly delivered at Northland, Ont., twenty-four miles north of this city on the Algoma Central Railway.

HOLIDAY BUSINESS MAKES NEW RECORD

Largest Volume for a Saturday Is Reported by Some Department Stores.

RUSH WAS LATE THIS YEAR

Several Executives Predict Total Sales for Season Will Exceed the 1915 Mark.

A record volume of business for a Saturday was reported yesterday by some department stores, where executives explained that it was because it was the last Saturday before Christmas. Reports on the holiday business by a representative number of department stores disclosed that the volume was ahead of that at last Christmas, despite the fact that Christmas buying was a little late in getting under way.

Several department store heads who commented on the holiday trade predicted that their sales for the holiday season of 1926 would exceed sales for 1915.

"The holiday business this year has been of very large volume," said John S. Burke, Vice President of B. Altman & Co., Fifth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street. "It surpasses that of any similar period in the history of B. Altman & Co."

Holiday Trade Started Late.

Bernard F. Gimbel, Vice President of Gimbel Brothers, said:

"Business this year is right up to our expectations. It has been a little bit late starting. But today is one of the liveliest we have ever had, and that is true of all our stores. The business of Gimbel Brothers has been up to expectations despite the fact that we have been put to the necessity of moving around a great deal on account of extensive alterations. We realize that this has been a great inconvenience to our customers, and we take every opportunity to express to them our appreciation of their patience.

"I have made a tour of all our other stores today and found that they were doing a lively business. Saks, Fifth Avenue, has the leading percentage of gain of any unit in our chain. They will have a record Christmas volume of business and a record for the year.

"Saks, Herald Square, is up with last year, and will show a holiday trade in advance of last year."

"Business has been better than last year," said Samuel Rayburn, Chairman of Lord & Taylor. "Business has been very satisfactory. People are still buying better things."

Christmas shopping reached its peak at R. H. Macy & Co. yesterday, according to a report by that company, which, in part, follows:

"A record holiday business, the largest in its history, has been done this year by R. H. Macy & Co., Inc. With 12,000 employes and practically every one of the 156 departments supplying Yuletide gifts, a record of 232,000 purchases for a day has been reached.

"The delivery of Christmas purchases is a gigantic task in itself. Macy's 355 delivery trucks have been handling as many as 75,000 packages a day and traveling an aggregate mileage sufficient to take them four-fifths around the world every day.

"In order to answer the thousands of questions by shoppers, the store has a staff of twenty-nine information clerks, as well as its 214 section managers. One of the information men recorded on a ticker in his hand 1,000 queries asked and answered in an hour. The most frequently asked questions concern the location of Santa Claus and the toy department.

"The leading single toy still remains the doll. One can buy for it now not only shoes, dresses and millinery, but also rainy-day outfits, umbrellas, vanity sets, trousseaus, hot-water bottles, eyeglasses, sun visors and wrist watches.

Want Constructive Playthings.

"An interesting revolution has taken place in the toy department this year in the form of a demand for practical, constructive playthings, as contrasted to the 'tin soldier' idea of years ago. The children seem to have become more sophisticated. The toys they seem to want now are the kind that enable them to do things and to copy the activities of life about them.

"Auto trucks, milk wagons, tractors, steam shovels, electric motors, concrete mixers, building sets and tool outfits are what many boys are going to get this Christmas. Some of the outfits enable a boy to construct his own toys."

S. Starr, Treasurer and merchandise manager of Oppenheim, Collins & Co., said:

"We have found that with fair weather people have been better able to go shopping, and business has been ahead of last year. It is difficult to make any comparisons regarding the volume of holiday business because we are a day further off from Christmas this year than we were last year, but I predict that the sale of holiday merchandise will go ahead of last year's volume."

WILSON DINNER TO BE OPEN.

Public to Be Admitted When Root Receives Peace Award.

The public as well as members and subscribers to the Woodrow Wilson Foundation will be admitted to the dinner on Dec. 28 at which Elihu Root will receive the foundation's $25,000 award, it was announced yesterday by Norman H. Davis, President of the foundation, who will preside at the dinner at the Hotel Astor at 7:30 o'clock.

Besides Mr. Root's address of acceptance of the award and the Wilson Medal "in recognition of his services to humanity and the cause of peace through justice, in helping to create the Permanent Court of International Justice, popularly known as the World Court," there will be an address by the Very Rev. Howard C. Robbins, Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. Mr. Root's speech will be broadcast.

The dinner at the Astor will occur on the seventieth anniversary of Woodrow Wilson's birth, and similar ceremonies will be held in many other communities. Reservations for the dinner here may be made through the Woodrow Wilson Foundation, 17 East Forty-second Street.

DR. JORDAN RAPS 'ISMS' IN PLEA FOR TRUTH

He Scoffs at 'Higher Foolishness' and Says Real Science Is What We Know.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 18.—Various "isms," "ologies," schools of thought, odd religious beliefs and fanciful ideas of healing were commented on whimsically yesterday by Dr. David Starr Jordan, Chancellor of Stanford University, in an address to the Commonwealth Club here.

The venerable President emeritus disclosed what he considered the ridiculous features of pseudo-science, queer creeds and extraordinary concepts of life, thought, mind and matter. Few were spared his mild sarcasm, those to whom the educator paid his respects including Mary Baker Eddy, Sir Oliver Lodge and Conan Doyle. Spiritualism, occultism, theosophy and belief in ghosts Dr. Jordan puts in the same class.

Entitling his address "The Higher Foolishness," Dr. Jordan applied to many of the creeds and so-called sciences the term "psyosophy," a word he said he had invented himself.

"It means," said Dr. Jordan, "the wisdom of shadows or the shadows of wisdom. In reality there is no science except the knowledge of things we know, have experienced or tested. Everything else is guesswork. There is not a political speech—Lincoln's excepted—which has not some psyosophy in it. If you carry algebra far enough you can get into psyosophy. If a straight line is carried far enough it will go around the world and be a circle.

"You can prove anything by proving its reverse. It is said that ghosts who hang around graves have a hard time to keep alive and occasionally kill people to suck their blood. Such ghosts are called werewolves or vampires, from which we get the modern word, 'vamp.'

"As we come to understand this universe in its detail, we will have a foundation for art and religion. Religion, like love, can be suppressed and perverted. Religion is the foundation on which all must rest. There is more psyosophy in religions than anywhere else. I believe thoroughly in religion and I believe in an infinite consciousness. It does not make any difference what I think or what you think, for, regardless of us, whatever is true is truth."

FIFTH AVE at FORTY-SIXTH

CHRISTMAS SERVICES IN CHURCHES TODAY

Many Sermons on Spirit of the Holiday Are Scheduled and Music Will Play Large Part.

CAROLS TO BE BROADCAST

Rockefeller Memorial Carillon Will Go on the Air Tonight With Program of Hymns.

Virtually all of the sectarian churches will observe Christmas at their services today. The Roman Catholic, Episcopal and Lutheran churches will observe the day on Christmas eve and Christmas morning. They will, however, hear sermons today in preparation for Christmas and will have Christmas music. Many Christmas services will be broadcast. An unusual number of carols will be on the air.

The Rockefeller Memorial Carillon of the Park Avenue Baptist Church at Sixty-fourth Street will broadcast this evening at 7 o'clock over Station WJZ the following: "O Come, O Come Emmanuel," Cradle Song of the Blessed Virgin, "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "Good Christian Men Rejoice," "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear," "We Three Kings of Orient Are," "Brightest and Best of the Sons of the Morning," "The First Noel," "While Shepherds Watched Their Flocks by Night," "Good King Wenceslaus" and "O Come, All Ye Faithful."

The Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, the pastor, will preach this morning a Christmas sermon, which will be broadcast by WJZ. A pageant, "The Night When Christ Was Born," will be produced by the Sunday school at a vesper service to be held at 4:30 o'clock. This evening Dr. Fosdick will give the seventh in a series of twelve weekly lectures on "A Pilgrimage to Palestine."

The Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman will deliver a Christmas address in the Bedford Y. M. C. A., Bedford Avenue and Monroe Street, Brooklyn, this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock, which will be broadcast by six radio stations. The Gloria Trumpeters will play Christmas carols, and there will be a solo on the chimes by George Betts.

"Glad Tidings—Great Joy," will be the topic at 2:30 o'clock today of the Rev. Dr. Daniel A. Poling, pastor of the Marble Collegiate Reformed Church, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street, before the Christmas service of the Young Peoples' Conference held there under the auspices of the Greater New York Federation of Churches. This will be broadcast over station WEAF.

A pre-Christmas service at 4 o'clock today in St. George's Episcopal Church, Stuyvesant Square and East Eighteenth Street, will be broadcast over Station WJZ. The regular choirs will be assisted by the Lenox String Quartet.

A Christmas radio mass meeting from 3:30 to 5 o'clock in the Rescue Mission, 5 Doyers Street, will be broadcast through Station WMCA. Alexander L. Jones, successor to Jerry McAuley as Superintendent of the Water Street Mission, will speak, and Thomas J. Noonan, the Superintendent of the Rescue Home, will preside. The Swedish Bethesda Church choir will sing.

A Christmas sermon will be preached this morning by the Rev. Dr. George A. Rommoser, President of the Lutheran Concordia Institute, Bronxville, N. Y., in St. Matthew's Lutheran Church, Convent Avenue and West 145th Street. The service will be broadcast by Station WRNY.

The Christmas service at Grace Methodist Church, 104th Street, between Amsterdam and Columbus Avenues, will be broadcast by WPCH. Louis Caton will sing, accompanied by the Maurice Leest Trio. The Rev. Dr. John L. Davis, the pastor, will preach a Christmas sermon.

The Christmas service this evening at the Chelsea Methodist Church, 178th Street and Fort Washington Avenue, will be broadcast over Station WRNY. The Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir of sixteen voices will sing, and the Rev. Dr. Christian F. Reisner, the pastor, will preach.

"If Christ Were King, Would You Imitate Him?" will be the topic at high mass today in St. Patrick's Cathedral of the Rev. Charles V. Connor, Dean of St. Francis Xavier's College. This is one of a course of weekly Advent sermons by Father Connor.

"The Messiah" will be sung today at 4 o'clock by the choir in the Brick Presbyterian Church, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-seventh Street. The Rev. Dr. William P. Merrill, the pastor, will preach on "Christ, the Word of the Living God." This morning at 11 o'clock Dr. Merrill will preach. At 10 o'clock the Sunday school will present a Christmas pageant, "Why the Chimes Rang." The choir will be accompanied at worship by violin, violoncello, harp and organ.

There will be four Christmas services today in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. The Rev. Dr. Henry Howard, the senior pastor, will preach this morning and at the "People's Service" this evening, and the Rev. Dr. Minot C. Morgan, the junior pastor, will preach at 4:30 o'clock. At 9:30 this morning the Sunday school will hold a service, "The Light on Syrian Hills." The quartet will sing carols.

A Christmas carol service will be held at 4 o'clock in St. Paul's Chapel, Columbia University. The Barnard Glee Club and the chapel choir, under the direction of Professor Walter H. Hall, will sing old and new carols. The Rev. Dr. Raymond C. Knox, the chaplain, will preach.

Members of the School of Religion at the Episcopal Church of the Ascension, Fifth Avenue and Tenth Street, will bring gifts to the altar there this morning, and these will be sent to a mission hospital to help make Christmas merry for the children there.

Handel's "Messiah" will be sung by the choir at 4 o'clock in St. Thomas's Episcopal Church, Fifth Avenue and Fifty-third Street.

The Advent section of Handel's "Messiah" will be sung at 4 o'clock by the combined choirs in St. James's Episcopal Church, Madison Avenue and Seventy-first Street. This will be under the direction of G. Darlington Richards, organist and choirmaster.

"God Appoints a Receiver" will be the subject of a Christmas sermon this morning by the Rev. Dr. Ralph W. Sockman, pastor of the Madison Avenue Methodist Church, at Sixtieth Street. This evening the Rev. John A. Vollenweider, the assistant, will preach on "If Christ Had Not Come."

"The Christmas Beautitude" will be the topic this morning at 11 o'clock of the Rev. Dr. Minot Simons, pastor of All Souls' Unitarian Church, Fourth Avenue and Twentieth Street. Preceding this service the Sunday School will present a Christmas pageant, "The Star of Bethlehem." The Christmas offering will be for the endowment fund of the church.

A Christmas carol office will be presented at 4 o'clock in the Episcopal Church of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie. The Rev. Dr. William Norman Guthrie, the rector, will read a "Christmas Message." There will follow a "Christmas Mystery" play in three scenes.

"The Greatest Name in History" will be the theme this morning of a Christmas sermon by the Rev. Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin, pastor of the West End Presbyterian Church, Amsterdam Avenue and 105th Street. This evening the choir will present a Christmas concert, assisted by the Aida Brass Quartet.

A Christmas carol service will be rendered by the choir this evening in the West Park Presbyterian Church, Amsterdam Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street. This morning the Rev. Dr. Anthony H. Evans, the pastor will preach a Christmas sermon.

"Bethlehem the Little" will be the topic this evening of the Rev. Dr. Augustus Steimle, pastor of the Lutheran Church of the Advent, Broadway and Seventy-third Street. At 6 o'clock, at "The Fireside Hour," there will be carols by the Young People's Lutheran League.

A candle light service, beginning with a processional of the choir, will be held this evening in St. Paul's Methodist Church, West End Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street. The choir, assisted by a stringed orchestra, will sing the cantata, "The Christ-Child," by C. B. Hawley. This morning the Rev. Dr. Raymond L. Forman, the pastor, will preach a Christmas sermon.

Handel's "Messiah," with orchestra accompaniment, will be sung this evening by the Manhattan Oratorio Society in the West Side Methodist Church, 461 West Forty-fourth Street.

The Advent and Christmas portions of Handel's "Messiah" will be sung this evening by the combined choirs, assisted by soloists, in St. Clement's Episcopal Church, West Forty-sixth Street and Ninth Avenue.

The theme of the Christmas sermon of the Rev. Dr. A. Wakefield Slaten, pastor of the West Side Unitarian Church, 110th Street, just east of Broadway, will be "A Modern Estimate of Jesus."

"Christmas Giving" will be the subject this morning at 11 o'clock of the Rev. Dr. Frank Oliver Hall, acting pastor of the Universalist Church of the Divine Paternity. At 10 o'clock the Sunday School will have a special Christmas service.

A program of Christmas music will be given this morning in the University Heights Presbyterian Church under the direction of Willard Sektberg, organist and choirmaster.

"A Christly Christmas" will be the subject this morning of the Rev. Dr. George W. Grinton, Superintendent of the Five Points Mission, at the Christmas service in that building, 60 Madison Street. The new choir of fifteen voices will sing carols. This is made up of young women and men, most of whom are of Italian parentage, and all products of the mission.

Thomas à Kempis's "The Imitation of Christ" will form the topic of the Christmas sermon this morning by the Rev. John Herman Randall, the associate pastor, in the Community Church, Park Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street.

A nativity play of ancient Christmas carols, "The Coming of the Prince of Peace," will be given this evening by members of the Sunday School and the Vested Church choir in Hamilton Grange Reformed Church, Convent Avenue and West 149th Street.

The cantata, "The Story of Christmas," by H. Alexander Matthews, will be sung at 4:30 o'clock in the West End Collegiate Reformed Church, Seventy-seventh Street and West End Avenue. This morning the Rev. Dr. Henry Evertson Cobb, the pastor, will preach a Christmas sermon.

"The Religious Preparation—Judea" will be the subject this morning of a pre-Christmas sermon by the Rev. De Witt P. Pelton, rector of St. James's Episcopal Church, Jerome Avenue and 190th Street, Fordham.

A Christmas pageant, "The Nativity and the Visit of the Wise Men," will be given this evening in the Episcopal Church of the Holy Trinity, Clinton and Montague Streets, Brooklyn, by the pupils of the Sunday school, and the music will be provided by the full choir under the direction of Professor Louis Robert, the organist.

"Bethlehem," a sacred cantata by Maunder, will be sung this evening by the choir in St. Ann's Episcopal Church, Clinton and Livingston Streets, Brooklyn, under the direction of W. C. Hardy, organist and director.

"The Meaning of Christmas" will be the topic this morning of the Rev. L. W. Barnard, pastor of Calvary Baptist Church, Fourth Avenue and Fourteenth Street, Brooklyn. This evening he will preach on "A Christmas Song."

A "White Gift Service" will be held this morning in the Clinton Avenue Congregational Church, at Lafayette Avenue, Brooklyn. The Rev. Fritz W. Baldwin, the pastor, will preach on "An Understanding Heart." At 5 o'clock there will be a "welcome" meeting for the young people home from school on vacation.

"The Christmas Pilgrimage" will be the theme this morning of the Rev. Dr. William Carter, pastor of the Throop Avenue Presbyterian Church, at Macon Street, Brooklyn. This evening he will preach on "The Angel's Christmas Song."

The Rev. Robert Arthur Elwood, pastor of "The Boardwalk Church," Atlantic City, N. J., will speak this afternoon at the Central Y. M. C. A., 55 Hanson Place, Brooklyn, on "The Significance of Christmas."

The annual service of Christmas music will take place this evening in the Unitarian Church of the Saviour, Pierrepont Street and Monroe Place, Brooklyn. The choir will be augmented by members of the choirs of St. Bartholomew's and Trinity Episcopal Churches, Manhattan. Miss Ruth Shaffner, soprano in St. Bartholomew's choir, will assist.

"The Biology of Jesus" will be the topic this morning of the Rev. Dr. J. Lane Miller, pastor of the Hanson Place Methodist Church. This evening he will give an illustrated travel talk as a prelude to a Christmas musical service. A chorus-choir of 200 voices will sing at both services, with Winnifred Broughton Hunter as the soloist.

A chorus of 150 voices, assisted by an orchestra, will sing this evening at a Christmas service in the Central Presbyterian Church, Jefferson and Marcy Avenues, Brooklyn.

Health Relief Agencies to Merge.

The Cardiac Vocational Guidance Committee, which helps train children afflicted with heart disease, and finds jobs for them within their capacities, will be merged with the New York Tuberculosis and Health Association on Jan. 1, it was announced yesterday. During the year 1,393 cases were brought to the committee for aid.

HISTORICAL CLOCKS PRESENTED TO N. Y. U.

Collection Valued at $150,000 Given by James Arthur, Who Assembled It Over 40 Years.

SOME OBJECTS VERY RARE

Story of Timekeeping From Simplest Sun Dial and Hour-glass to Complicated Mechanisms Shown.

New York University received yesterday one of the largest historical collections of clocks and watches in existence valued at $150,000. It was given by James Arthur, formerly of Brooklyn, now of New Rochelle, N. Y. The collection was accepted on behalf of New York University by General Charles H. Sherrill, a member of the University Council and Chairman of the Department of Fine Arts. The appointment of Professor Emeritus Daniel W. Hering as curator of the collection was also announced by Chancellor Elmer Ellsworth Brown.

Consisting of more than 1,800 objects, the collection presents a story of the evolution of timekeeping from the simplest sun dial and hour-glass to clocks with three dials and complicated mechanisms. The watches have been selected to show primarily the mechanical evolution of watch movements. However, the art work of the early watchmakers as illustrated in case and works design is an important feature. There is also a library containing historical accounts of watch and clock making as well as modern treatises.

The collection was made by Mr. Arthur personally and was assembled by him over a period of forty years. A modest monetary value of $150,000 has been set on the collection, although many of the clocks cannot be duplicated.

The collection is being installed in a room in the Gould Memorial Library at University Heights, where it will soon be open to public inspection. In this building and in the rooms under the adjacent Hall of Fame are other valuable exhibits which form the nucleus of material for a proposed museum.

The collection is of value to the School of Engineering as an exposition of mechanical development. The case designs, it is said, will be of interest to students in the Department of Fine Arts.

Mr. Arthur came to New York in 1871 from Scotland, where he had been trained in mechanics and woodwork. He studied in the Department of Science and Art of an Edinburgh technical school and became an expert in gear cutting. His interest in clocks was a natural result of his profession.

From the construction of sun dials, both of the accepted type and of his own design when he was no more than 16 years old, Mr. Arthur's interest in making timepieces grew. He has taken out a number of patents on his inventions. The Arthur Company Machine Works, which he established in Brooklyn in 1885, was his headquarters. During extensive travels, including a world tour, Mr. Arthur sought out and bought old clocks. He was interested in duplicating as well as restoring the works of antique specimens.

In the collection of nearly 300 clocks, composed of antiques which Mr. Arthur has restored and his own designs, the most unusual specimen is a French plate glass clock which is one of three in existence. One is in the British Museum and the other in the Paris Museum of Fine Arts. The "Sir Walter Scott Clock" has a skeleton brass frame which is a minature in the main outlines of the Sir Walter Scott gothic monument in Edinburgh. It was designed and made by Robert Bryson, the celebrated clockmaker of Edinburgh. In the "Monastery Bell," which stands ninety-six inches high on a base twenty-eight inches in diameter, the movement is fitted in a bell of elaborate design. Another interesting case is that of the French Buhl clock in which the tortoise shell ground is almost black. A minature of Father Time rests on top.

The clocks of Mr. Arthur's own design which he built for experiment are usually made on plans different from those for commercial clocks. A novel "repeater" clock built by Mr. Arthur in 1904 is so constructed with a large and small bell that by pulling a cord at any time, the clock will strike out the last hour on the large bell and the minute follows by taps on the smaller.

Fabian Robbin, Thomas Lomas, Ian Gobels, Nicholas Bougreau, Poligny and William Harris are among the names of makers on the restored clocks. There are more than twelve examples of Japanese clocks which Mr. Arthur brought from the Orient.

FIND POOR PUPILS THE MORE HONEST

Columbia School Tests Show the Wealthy Children Most Apt to Steal.

Studies of honesty among school children in cities and towns of the East indicate that children of wealth are more prone to steal money, that girls more often cheat in the class room and boys in games, and that honesty is in direct proportion to intelligence. The tests are being made by psychologists engaged in a "character education inquiry" at Columbia University, says The Associated Press.

A majority of the pupils were reported as lying when asked questions to which they felt an affirmative answer should be given, such as, "Do you read the Bible every day?" Ninety per cent. said they did, according to Dr. Mark A. May, one of the psychologists. Dr. May is on a three-year leave of absence from the Syracuse University Faculty.

Ingenious tests were devised to measure such abstract quantities as stealing, lying and cheating tendencies. Children were asked to solve a puzzle which involved the use of 60 cents in various coins. The object was to see how many would take the money.

Among the 250 Jewish orphans of the east side only 10 dimes disappeared. When the same test was given to children of the rich in an exclusive school it was found 18 per cent. took money, while in one case the coins disappeared, box and all, and in another a pupil hid a 25-cent piece, asserted it was an error and asked for a second, which also disappeared subsequently.

Standard intelligence tests were the basis for the announcement that generally the more intelligent the child the more honest he was. Home background was found to be the most powerful factor in shaping a child's character, the mother's influence exceeding the father's and that of the parents together far surpassing that of playmates, Boy Scouts or Campfire Girl leaders, or teachers in public or Sunday schools.

CORNELL ATHLETES TO AID EXPERIMENTS

Will Be Subjects for Dr. Hill, Coming From London to Lecture on Chemistry.

Special to The New York Times.

ITHACA, N. Y., Dec. 18.—Dr. Archibald Vivian Hill, F. R. S., Foulerton Research Professor of Physiology in the University of London, and Nobel Prize winner in medicine, will fill the George Fisher Baker non-resident lectureship in chemistry in Cornell University throughout the second semester of this academic year, from February to June, Professor L. M. Dennis, head of the department of chemistry, announced today.

Professor Hill has made studies of the chemistry and mechanism of muscular contraction, using athletes as experimental subjects, and he plans to develop these studies still further at Cornell. The university athletic association has offered to give him all possible aid.

Professor Hill, in cooperation with Meyerhof, worked out the finer details of the process of muscular contraction. He extended his investigations with normal men and athletes as his experimental subjects and in an address upon "The Physiological Basis of Athletic Records" he said:

"The practice of athletics is both a science and an art, and, just as art and science are the most potent ties tending to draw men together in a world of industrial competition, so spotr and athletics, by urging men to friendly rivalry, may help to avert the bitterness resulting from less peaceful struggles. If, therefore, physiology can aid in the development of athletics as a science and an art, I think it will deserve well of mankind. As in all these things, however, the reward will be reciprocal. Obviously in the data of athletic records we have a store of information available for physiological study.

"Apart from its usefulness, however, I would urge that the study is amusing. Most people are interested, at any rate in England and America, in some type of sport. If they can be made to find it more interesting, as I have found it, by a scientific contemplation of the things which every sportsman knows, then that extra interest is its own defense."

At the age of forty, Professor Hill is one of the youngest of the Fellows of the Royal Society, to which he was elected in 1918. His wife is a daughter of John Maynard Keynes, author of "The Economic Consequences of the Peace." He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and after graduating with honors and several prizes he was a fellow of that college for several years and then a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and university lecturer in physical chemistry. He held a professorship in the University of Manchester for four years until 1923, when he accepted the Jodrell professorship of physiology in University College, London. The Nobel prize in medicine was awarded to him in 1922.

The non-resident lectureship in chemistry at Cornell was founded and endowed last year by George F. Baker of New York.

Tell of His Life in Spain—They Are Gift of Prince Dolgorouki.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Dec. 18.—Eighteen letters written by Washington Irving and five by Sir David Wilkie, the distinguished English painter, to Prince Dmitri Ivanovitch Dolgorouki, once a member of the Russian Embassy at Madrid, have been acquired by the Yale University Library through the generosity of Yale alumni, Yale University announced today.

The university also announced that Henry Rogers Winthrop, B. A., 1898, of New York City, had pledged $30,000 to establish the Winthrop Fund for the benefit of the library in memory of his father, Buchanan Winthrop, B. A., 1862, who served as a member of the Yale Corporation from 1891 until his death in 1900.

The Washington Irving manuscripts and the letters of Sir David Wilkie have been in the possession of the Dolgorouki family since they were written, and have now been made available by Prince Dolgorouki, the grandson of Irving's friend. The letters from Irving extend over a period of about two years, from 1828 to 1830, while one is dated Oct. 18, 1842. All except one of these were written in Spain during the years that Irving was traveling in that country, living in the Alhambra and gathering material for his books on Columbus. Irving records his friendships, his travels and his literary occupations. He says in one or two of the letters that he is anxiously searching for an authentic portrait of Columbus. More particularly, the letters tell a rather complete story of Irving's interest, strengthened by the friendships with Dolgorouki and Wilkie, in Spanish painting.

The letters of the painter Wilkie form an integral part of the collection since they discuss still further the subject which interested Irving, and frequently refer to him and his work. Their dates are 1828, 1829, 1834 and 1836. The last two, later than those written by Irving, give glimpses of Irving after he returned to America in 1832.

"The value of this new gift," Professor Andrew Keogh, University Librarian, said today, "lies in the unpublished letter therein, and in the singular unity of the twenty-three letters; together they offer a valuable record of Irving's life during the years 1828 and 1829. When this gift is placed beside the Irving letters which were given to the library in 1924, and the notebooks donated in 1925, it is possible to regard the Yale collection of Irvingana as one of the most valuable of its kind in America."

NEW NEWSPAPER COURSE.

Rutgers School to Teach Business Management, Prof. Will Announces.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Dec. 18.—Business management of newspapers will be added to the curriculum of the Department of Journalism at Rutgers University next year, it was announced today by Professor Allen S. Will, head of the department. The course is designed to be of use to students who intend to prepare for weekly journalism, publishing or advertising, and will require six hours a week in the junior and senior years.

The work of the junior year will cover business management and newspaper circulation methods, and in the senior year students will study advertising.

Twenty-five students from the men's and women's colleges of the university are enrolled in the journalism department, which was established two years ago at the instigation of the New Jersey Press Association.

Professor Will announced that he would send to the members of the State Press Association a confidential report of the abilities of each student graduated by the School of Journalism.

that will last indefinitely!

"The yesterday of today was the today of yesterday —so smoothly run the courses of nature that all unnoticed present news merges into past history."

COMMENCING January 1, 1927, The New York Times will print a number of copies of its Daily and Sunday issues on pure rag paper stock in order that the printed record of the day's news may be preserved against the deterioration which takes place in the print paper made of wood fibers now generally in use.

These permanent records will be bound (two volumes to each month) and sold to Libraries, Institutions, Corporations, and individuals for $170.00 per year. (Delivered in the United States.)

The New York Times INDEX

The only newspaper index in United States published continuously since 1913. A new volume is published every three months. The contents form an alphabetical list of newspaper references, indexed by subjects and names fully cross-referenced to persons and related events. Following the subject is a brief summary of the news reports with dates of publication, page and column notations.

As news is published the same day in most all daily newspapers, the date guides one to similar and supplemental information in other newspapers, periodicals, clipping files and reference sources. For general reference The Index gives complete information without recourse to newspaper files.

The New York Times Index is now the standard newspaper reference in all classes of libraries all over the world. It is invaluable to every one who needs to refer to newspaper files.

BEGIN HEALTH DRIVE IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Parents Urged to Have Family Physicians Examine Their Children Thoroughly.

MEDICAL BODIES BACK PLAN

Principals and Superintendents Also Enrolled to Remedy Defects and Check Disease.

Parents who can afford to go to a private physician are to be asked to take their children to their family doctors for thorough physical examination before entering them in the public schools, Dr. Louis I. Harris, Commissioner of Health, said yesterday.

The decision was reached at a conference in Dr. Harris's office attended by Dr. William J. O'Shea and the presidents of the five county medical societies within New York City. Dr. O'Shea is to call meetings of District Superintendents and principals to acquaint them with the plan to interest parents in discovering physical defects and preventing disease.

Families that have heretofore received notices from the Department of Health to have their children examined by private physicians have largely ignored the notices, Dr. Harris said. As a result, Department of Health physicians have had to examine not only the children of the poor but of the well-to-do and of others who could afford to go to a family doctor. In consequence, wholesale examinations have had to be of necessity so brief and hurried that the full measure of benefit could not be given.

As a result of the conference, the heads of the county medical societies have agreed, Dr. Harris said, to bring home to the family physician the need of doing this work thoroughly. The medical societies will advise the doctors in the technique of these new health examinations as opposed to the examination of the sick. The Bulletins of the Health Department and other facilities of instruction will be made available.

The physicians cooperating in the plan are, Dr. W. R. Jaseway, President of the Richmond County Medical Society; Dr. D. E. McMahon, head of the Queens County Medical Society; Dr. C. Paul Humpstone, President of the Kings County Medical Society; Dr. E. R. Cunniffe, President of the Bronx County Medical Society, and Dr. William P. Healy, head of the New York County Medical Society.

ENVOY TEACHES LANGUAGE.

Minister Prince Gives Lessons in Serbian to Fellow Diplomats.

Foreign diplomats accredited to the Court of King Alexander of Yugoslavia at Belgrade are studying the Serbian language under the tutorship of John Dyneley Prince, American Minister to Belgrade, and former Professor of Slavonic languages, and at another time of Semitic languages at Columbia University. The American Minister disclosed that he was coaching his fellow diplomats yesterday in discussing the exceedingly bright future of Yugoslavia, the capability and popularity of that country's King, and the possibility of Balkan alliances which would make for the peace of Europe.

In telling of the diplomatic course in Serbo-Croate tongue, Mr. Prince explained that it was his knowledge of the Slavic language, base of Serbian, which had inspired the other diplomatic representatives to learn to speak the language of the country to which they were accredited. Mr. Prince made it a point to learn that language when he was informed four years ago of his impending transfer from Copenhagen, where he was American Minister, to Belgrade. He was lucky enough to find a Serbian young woman, wife of an architect in Copenhagen, and she tutored the former Columbia professor, who already had first-hand knowledge of the Russian language.

"I am the only man in the American diplomatic service who speaks Serbian," said Minister Prince. "When King Alexander discovered that I could speak to him in his native language he often would come over to me and begin a conversation. He is very engaging and very democratic. I have tried to persuade the King and Queen of Yugoslavia to visit the United States, but I suppose there is little likelihood of such a visit as a result of recent internal complications."

Mr. Prince has been home on a two-months leave, and sails for his post on Dec. 27.

TO HONOR STANLEY BRUCE.

English Speaking Union Plans a Reception for Australian Premier.

A reception to honor Stanley M. Bruce, Prime Minister of Australia, and Mrs. Bruce will be held by the English-Speaking Union of the United States on the afternoon of Dec. 29 at Roosevelt House, 28 East Twentieth Street.

The visitors are expected on Dec. 28 from London, where the Premier attended the recent British Imperial Conference. Announcement of the reception of John Daniels, Secretary of the English-Speaking Union, said it had been arranged through the cooperation of Sir Hugh R. Denison, newly appointed Commissioner for Australia in the United States, and the Roosevelt House to give members and guests an opportunity to meet the Premier informally in a historic American setting. The membership of the union in this country, he said, had increased to 12,000. Some members from other cities are expected to attend.

WILL TEST 'SPIRIT VOICES.'

Delicate Instruments Are Set Up In London for Mediums to Face.

LONDON, Dec. 18 (AP).—Spook voices are to be tested by a delicate instrument installed at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research. Scientists are eagerly awaiting the first trial of the new machine. London and some of the near-by cities boast of ten or fifteen experienced mediums who specialize in producing the direct or indirect spirit voice, and inducements have been made to several of them to appear before the apparatus at various times.

The instrument was conceived by Professor Harry Price, Director of the National Laboratory, and was designed to establish definitely whether spirits do actually speak from space. Professor Price says his apparatus is absolutely fraud-proof and will provide the most drastic test ever arranged for any medium.

Finds Average American Has Tenth-Grade Education

Owing to the increase in the period of school attendance the average American now has a tenth grade education, according to a preliminary report of the Committee of History Teaching in the Schools of the American Historical Association made public yesterday at the Endowment Headquarters of the association at Columbia University. There are fourteen grades open to public school goers.

"It was long a commonplace to speak of our citizens as equipped with an average education of the sixth grade," says the report. "That observation was voiced as late as 1919 at the end of the World War. Any attempt to state the average school education today would have to place the figure somewhere in the tenth grade, and it seems quite possible that the next generation will have an average school education equivalent to the twelfth grade."

The report declares that the social maturity of school children now is far in advance of their physical and mental development, owing to the shift of population from rural to urban centres.

CURTIS GIVES $75,000 TO URSINUS COLLEGE

Publisher Sends His Check as a Christmas Present—Has Previously Aided the Institution.

COLLEGEVILLE, Pa., Dec. 18 (AP).—When President George L. Omwake of Ursinus College opened his mail today he found a letter of four lines transmitting a check for $75,000 as a Christmas gift to the college. The letter and check bore the signature of Cyrus H. K. Curtis, the Philadelphia publisher.

Mr. Curtis was present at President Omwake's inauguration in 1913 and has been a member of the Advisory Council of the college since. At various times he has contributed to the institution. A year ago he gave $25,000.

Mr. Curtis imposes no restrictions on the college as to the use which shall be made of his gift. This will be determined by the Board of Directors at an early meeting.

WHAT BARNARD ALUMNAE DO

Survey Shows Many Have Attained Distinction in Various Fields.

Graduates of Barnard College have attained distinction as writers, administrators, research workers, actresses, teachers, political leaders and business women, says the report of a survey published yesterday by Columbia University. To show the diversity of fields into which graduates have entered, Roda Milliken, a policewoman of Washington, D. C., is cited.

Among those named as writers are Alice Duer Miller, Babette Deutsch, Frida Kirchway, Leonie Adams and E. Betty Kallsher. Among the actresses are Helen Gahagan, Aline McMahon, Vera Schloss, Anne Schmidt and Helen Mack. Dean Gildersleeve of Barnard and Mrs. Mabel Smith Douglass Dean of the New Jersey State College for Women are cited as educators. Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw and Sarah Schuyler Butler are listed as political workers.

Ann Kutner and Ida Rolf Demmerle, both with the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research and F. Edith Carrothers, a psychologist in the Children's Court are cited as research workers. Mrs. Waldo Frank, Mrs. Paul Mary E. Opdycke Felts are among others prominent in varying fields.

ARMY CADETS TO GET LEAVE.

Upper Classmen Have 10 Days, but Plebes Must Stay for Christmas.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Dec. 18.—Seven hundred cadets, members of the three upper classes at the United States Military Academy, will leave Thursday on their annual Christmas vacation, which will end on Jan. 2.

Christmas leave has been restricted to the upper classmen since the establishment of the academy. As a matter of fact a cadet gets no vacation until after he has completed a year and a half of work. Then, as an upper classman, he is allowed to go on Christmas leave.

Any cadet whose military conduct or whose academic standing is not satisfactory is not permitted to go on leave.

Although the plebes are not permitted to leave the academy during the Christmas holidays they enjoy a great amount of liberty. They have all privileges of an upper class nature, including cadet hops. Motion picture shows are frequent during the ten-day vacation. Due to the cessation of all academic work the plebes have all day in which to take part in athletic sports and Winter recreational activities.

QUEEN SAW MOULIN ROUGE.

Victoria of Spain Insisted, Protocol or No Protocol.

PARIS, Dec. 18 (AP).—Queen Victoria of Spain is an up-to-date sovereign who wants to see everything interesting when she visits Paris, particularly if King Alfonso already has had a chance to see it. After dutifully attending the classic Comédie Française and the Opéra on her latest visit here the Queen expressed a desire to go to the Moulin Rouge to see the revue. The Police Commissary assigned as escort, threw up his hands in horror.

"But, your Majesty," he remonstrated. "The protocol! Has your Majesty thought of that?"

By the protocol he meant the agreement among powers to protect visiting dignitaries against any situation which might be regarded as unworthy of their position.

"Weren't you assigned to guide King Alfonso about Paris?" queried the Queen.

"Yes," replied the police official.

"Well, he told me you took him to the Moulin Rouge," the Queen resumed, imperturbably, "so I see no reason for my not going there as well."

Her Majesty went.

Hadassah to Hold Conferences.

The third annual midwinter conference of Hadassah, the women's Zionist organization of America, will be held in this city on Dec. 26, 27 and 28. It will represent 40,000 women. The junior Hadassah will meet on the first day in the Park Royal Hotel, 23 West Seventy-third Street. The senior delegates will convene on the other two days in the Manhattan Square Hotel, 50 West Seventy-seventh Street.

HONOR 8 COUPLES WED OVER 50 YEARS

Townsfolk of Milo, Maine, Give Public Reception After Reunion Dinner.

GREETED BY BRIDAL CHORUS

Two of the Couples Had Observed Their 50th Anniversary—All Guests of the Son of One of the Couples.

MILO, Me., Dec. 18 (AP).—Time rolled back half a century in this little village today as eight couples, all of whom have been married more than fifty years, dined together and exchanged reminiscences of years gone by.

They were the guests of the son of one of the aged couples, Walter E. Dillon, who is proprietor of one of the two hotels in this little town of less than 3,000 population.

They came dressed in their best and with smiles and active steps that belied their advancing years. Arm in arm they walked into the dining room to the memory-stirring strains of "The Bridal Chorus" from "Lohengrin."

Two of the couples present had observed their sixtieth wedding anniversaries. They were Mr. and Mrs. Barton Ramsdell and Mr. and Mrs. John Dillon. Other guests were Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Leonard and Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Shaw, who have been married 54 years; Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Martin and the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Frohock, married 52 years, and Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Brackett and Mr. and Mrs. A. V. Carey, married 51 years.

A prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. Frohock, who presided. Then, while Winter winds swept the frozen country outside, they enjoyed an old-fashioned New England turkey dinner and talked of half-forgotten days.

Afterward there was a musical program and the townspeople came to a public reception, to extend to the aged people their congratulations on the health and happiness that has attended them.

LIMIT SMOKING AT SMITH.

Students Restrict Practice to Pond Path and Town Tea Rooms.

NORTHAMPTON, Mass., Dec. 18 (AP).—The period of abnegation for the students of Smith College who would smoke is at an end. With the announcement of new rules today the name of Paradise Pond takes on new significance, for the path which circles it is designated as the only part of the college domain where smoking is approved.

The question of cigarettes had been left to the decision of the student body by the authorities for the past year. Last Spring the undergraduate body voted to approve smoking in the dormitories.

The authorities, however, pointed out the fire risks involved and requested the students to reconsider their vote. About a month ago the students voluntarily decided to forbid this practice, on the promise of their leader that some substitute plan would be worked out before the Christmas recess.

Yesterday the suggestions of the leaders were submitted to the students, who accept two. One permits smoking on the path circling the pond, which lies entirely within the campus, and the other allows smoking in the tea rooms of the town. These liberties become operative on the return of the girls to college on Jan. 7.

CHEMICAL SOCIETY ELECTS.

Prof. A. W. Thomas of Columbia Made Chairman of New York Section

The New York section of the American Chemical Society announced yesterday the election of its officers for 1927. Professor Arthur W. Thomas of Columbia University was named Chairman, and Dr. Charles R. Downs, consulting chemist, Vice Chairman. D. H. Killeffer, associate editor of "Industrial and Engineering Chemistry," will be Secretary-Treasurer.

The Executive Committee for 1927 includes K. G. Mackenzie of the Texas Company, F. E. Breithut of City College, R. P. Rose of the United States Rubber Company and L. W. Woodford of the Chemical Foundation.

The councilors elected are: B. T. Brooks and Allan R. Albright, consulting chemists; J. D. Davidson, Carbide and Carbon Chemicals Corporation; M. H. Ittner, Colgate & Co.; Professor James Kendall, New York University; Professor H. R. Moody, City College; Professor Thomas B. Freas, Columbia University; R. R. Renshaw, New York University; H. B. Lowe, Chemical Catalog Company; S. P. Burke, Combustion Utilities Corporation; Professor Thomas, Dr. Downs and Mr. Killeffer.

PRINCETONIAN ELECTS.

Horace Rose of Ohio New Chairman of Campus Newspaper.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Dec. 18.—Elections to the Board of The Daily Princetonian, the campus newspaper of Princeton University, placed Horace C. Rose of Columbus, Ohio, as Chairman of the paper for the coming year. The 1928 board will take over the duties on March 1.

Rose, who is to succeed Frank Peabody of Montgomery, Ala., is Secretary of the National Student Federation of America and is prominent in debating at Princeton. The new business manager will be William I. Laporte of Baltimore, and Albert Keep of Chicago will head the photographic board of the paper. The other officers are Sinclair H. Kingsley of Minneapolis, Benjamin W. Norris of New York, Wistar H. Maclaren of Princeton, John S. McMartin of Phoenix, Ariz., and David C. Brodie of Owensboro, Ky.

The new business board comprises James W. Lee of New York and John S. Bachellor of Newark. Walter W. K. Bennett of New York will be photographic service manager.

FRENCH CABINET AUTHORS.

Nine of the Thirteen Ministers Have Published Their Writings.

PARIS, Dec. 18 (AP).—Nine of the thirteen Ministers in M. Poincaré's Cabinet confess to being authors. In fact, M. Poincaré himself and M. Barthou, his Minister of Justice, have so shone in the field of history and literary criticism that they are both members of the French Academy.

Minister of War Painlevé, producer of some noted mathematical treatises as well as war books, belongs to the Academy of Sciences.

M. Briand, Foreign Minister, has published the series of speeches he delivered when the separation of Church and State was effected in France. M. Sarraut, his colleague of the Interior, has several books on civil government to his credit.

M. Herriot, Minister of Education, is perhaps the most versatile writer in the Cabinet. His fields of endeavor include literary biography ("Mme. Recamier"), political science ("To Create," "To Act"), nature description ("The Norman Forest") and travel sketches of Germany, Russia and America.

André Tardieu, Minister of Public Works, has published notably "America in Arms."

The poet of the Cabinet is M. Georges Leygues, Minister of Marine, who, besides two volumes of verse, has a life of his distinguished predecessor, Colbert, and a pedagogical work to his credit.

M. Léon Perrier, Minister of Colonies, has published two books on fishing and fish culture.

101ST BALL FOR OLD GUARD.

Society on Jan. 28 will Recall First One Held in 1826.

The 101st annual ball of the Old Guard Society will be held at the Waldorf, Jan. 28, it was announced yesterday by Major Edward Havemeyer Snyder, commanding officer of the Old Guard. The first floor of the hotel will be decorated to resemble the promenade and ballroom of the old Academy of Music as it was on the occasion of the Old Guard's first ball in 1826.

Governor Smith has promised to review the grand parade of the Old Guard, in which it is expected that more than 1,000 men in uniform will participate. There also will be a fashion show of dresses worn at the time of the first ball.

PRIZES ARE OFFERED FOR BEST GARDEN PLAN

New York Botanical Opens Contest to Popularize 'One-Man' Plots.

A nation-wide prize competition open to men and women in every State to discover the best plan for a "one-man garden" is announced by the New York Botanical Garden.

The aim of the contest is "to popularize the possibilities of small one-man or one-woman gardens, with a maximum of taste and minimum of expense." The contest will close March 1, 1927, and in the Spring or early Summer the Botanical Garden will lay out in its grounds the prize garden.

Either professionals or amateurs, other than landscape gardeners and employes or members of the staff of the New York Botanical Garden, are eligible to the contest. The first prize is $100, with second and third prizes of $75 and $25.

The area of the "one-man garden" is to be 40 by 52 feet, and the plans submitted should be scaled one-quarter of an inch to the foot.

Simplicity and lasting beauty will be the outstanding features of the winning plan, the announcement indicates.

The Garden Club of America, the Federated Garden Clubs of New York State, and the New York Botanical Garden will each appoint a garden expert to serve on the jury.

Last year's prize garden, planted from the scheme submitted by Archie S. Hill of Wauwatosa, Wis., will be maintained as a public exhibit in 1927, according to Dr. Nathaniel L. Britton, director-in-chief.

NEW RAIL TOURIST BUREAU.

New York Central to Open Office Tomorrow to Help Travelers.

The New York Central Travel Bureau, an innovation of the New York Central Lines, will open at the Grand Central Terminal tomorrow, according to an announcement made yesterday.

This bureau is housed in a steel structure in the centre of the north balcony of the terminal, directly opposite the information booth on the concourse level. The traveler may sit in an easy chair there while planning with railroad experts trips to all parts of the United States, Mexico, Canada and Hawaii.

HUMANE AWARDS FOR BOYS.

Six to Be Awarded at P. S. 22 for Animal Rescue Work.

At the 9 o'clock assembly, on Wednesday morning, in Public School 22, Miss Alice Carroll of the Department of Humane Education on behalf of the A. S. P. C. A. will present inscribed copies of the book "Animal Pals" to six boys who did particularly good work in animal rescue work at the Delancey Street Shelter last Summer.

Public school children take a very active part, according to Miss Carroll, in the animal rescue work in the city. No less than 25,000 cats and dogs were saved from abuse or accident this Summer. While there have been other prize awards, commencing with the early part of the school term, the group at Public School 22 is considered one of the best. The six boys, 12 to 14 years old, Solomon Krauss, Bennie Wolf, Aaron Messinger, Paul Miller, Harold Steiner, Joseph Colisse, formed a special brigade, and with the aid of an express wagon made of a big packing box on wheels, they brought a large number of stray and sick cats into the Delancey Street Shelter. The Shelter, said Miss Carroll, is near Stuyvesant Fish Park, in the vicinity of the Delancey Street bridge.

Mary Oka, 10 years old, of Public School 77, stands out among the girls in Miss Carroll's mind. She was very active and while the six boys about to get their books specialized in bringing in wretched animals, Mary had a way of discovering batches of new kittens in the neighborhood of the Eighty-fifth Street Shelter, and of finding homes for many of them.

PIGEON HERO DIES IN FRANCE

Bird Was Wounded Carrying Message That Helped Save Verdun.

PARIS, Dec. 18 (AP).—One of the feathered heroes of the World War, a carrier pigeon which helped save Verdun, has just died of old age. The bird had a wound stripe on its leg band and was one of the Government's pensioners, having received a home and a largess from a grateful nation.

Through a barrage of shrapnel the pigeon in 1916 carried a message that kept Froideterre Hill from being captured. In an order of the day the army cited the pigeon for "having maintained communication with the front line when all human means failed." In its flight through the barrage the pigeon was hit by a shell splinter that carried away its claws.

The pigeon will be mounted and placed in the Verdun War Museum.

"The most beautiful Antique Oriental Rugs I have ever seen...."

—said a well known New York collector.

MR. MICHAELYAN spent four months searching the most noted rug collections of Europe and the Orient for these precious masterpieces. He found but thirty—each a rare antique treasure—individually selected by Mr. Michaelyan for the Oriental rug lovers of New York. He is now personally showing and offering these beautiful art treasures for private sale at most reasonable prices.

In this unusual collection you no doubt will find the rare antique Oriental rugs you have long desired but never found in any other collection. We suggest you make your selections early.

Among them are such rare pieces as:

Oushak (Central part of Turkey) Medallion Hispano Moresque Carpet, Asia Minor, late XVI Century. Field of pale scarlet with green, length 16 feet 9 inches, width 9 feet 6 inches.

Koula Prayer Rug, early XVII Century. Field of deep blood-red, length 5 ft. 4 in., width 4 ft. 1 in.

HARRIET E. MEYER WEDS

Is Married to John H. Betz in St. Thomas's Church—Marie Fisk Weds J. A. Toulemonde.

Miss Ruth Eleanor Erbsloh, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph A. Erbsloh of 100 Central Park South, was married to Paul Immo Gulden of this city, son of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Richard Gulden of Leipsic, Germany, yesterday afternoon in the chapel of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Dr. Minot C. Morgan.

The church was decorated with Austrian tree ferns and white bride chrysanthemums. Large standards of white chrysanthemums were on each side of the altar. The balcony was festooned with Southern smilax and white chrysanthemums and clusters of lillies were attached to the ends of the pews in the centre aisle.

The bride, whose father gave her in marriage, wore a gown of white chiffon embellished with flounces of old rose point lace which had been in the family for many years and which also formed the bertha collar and long sleeves. The train, of ivory satin lined with chiffon, had a border of the lace on either side, and fell from the shoulders. The veil of tulle was arranged in cap shape and held in place with a coronet of orange blossoms. The bride carried a bouquet of lilies of the valley, gardenias and white sweet peas.

Mrs. Gertrude Mueller, the bride's sister, was matron of honor. She wore a gown of silver lace over silver cloth and a picture hat to match her gown. She carried a bouquet of white sweet peas, yellow pansies and yellow pernet roses.

The bridesmaids were the Misses Louise Goetze, May Rotherham, Marga Erbsloh and Elizabeth Roberts Ebert. They wore rose colored robes de style and picture hats to match. They carried bouquets of white sweet peas, yellow pansies and yellow pernet roses. Monica Mueller, the bride's niece, was flower girl and Elizabeth Weiss, a cousin of the bride, was the page.

John Richard Freyesleben was best man. The ushers were Theodore Thiesing, Charles Huntington Erhart, Karl von Clemm, Werner A. Gunther, Gideon von Wallenberg Pachaly and Dr. Robert Balk. A large reception followed in the ballroom of the Park Lane.

Following a wedding trip in Cuba, Mr. and Mrs. Gulden will live in this city.

GOV. SMITH A HIT AS SINGER AT DINNER

Assisted by Hughes and Root, He Rendered 'Bowery Song' at Reunion Friday Night.

100 GUESTS JOINED CHORUS

Governor Would Have Been Great Singer, Was One View, if He Hadn't Become a Great Statesman.

Members of the 1915 State Constitutional Convention who attended Friday night's reunion dinner at the Hotel Astor said yesterday that the best fun of the affair was when Governor Smith sang a verse of "The Bowery" as a solo, and made the dignified Charles E. Hughes and Elihu Root join in the chorus.

An orchestra played old songs between courses at the dinner. It played the chorus of "The Bowery" and then switched abruptly into the chorus of "The Sidewalks of New York." At this point Governor Smith, who was sitting at the left of De Lancey Nicoll, toastmaster, jumped up.

"Stop that!" he called to the orchestra leader. "Wait a minute! Have you got the music for 'The Bowery'?"

The orchestra leader, who seemed surprised, said he had not.

"Never mind," the Governor replied. "I'll sing the verse and you fellows (waving at Messrs. Hughes, Root and other distinguished guests) join in on the chorus."

The Governor sang in a way that caused Mr. Nicoll to say later that he would have been a great singer if he had not become a great statesman, and practically all of the 100 diners, including Mr. Hughes and Mr. Root, joined in the chorus with gusto and good-will.

Here is the song:

Oh, the night that I struck New York I went out for a quiet walk.
Folks who are onto the city say, better by far that I took Broadway.
But I was out to enjoy the sights; there was the Bowery, ablaze with lights.
I had one of the devil's own nights—I'll never go there any more.

Chorus.

The Bowery, the Bowery,
They say such things and they do strange things
On the Bowery, the Bowery—
I'll never go there any more.

I had walked but a block or two when up came a fellow and me he knew.
Then a policeman came walking by, chased him away, and I asked him why.
"Wasn't he pulling your leg?" said he. Said I: "He never laid hands on me!"
"Get off the Bowery, you yap!" said he—I'll never go there any more.

I went into an auction store. I never saw any thieves before.
First he sold me a pair of socks, then said: "How much for the box?"
Some one said: "Two dollars!" I said: "Three!" He emptied the box and gave it to me.
"I sold the box, not the socks," said he—I'll never go there any more.

I went into a concert hall. I didn't have a good time at all.
Just the minute that I sat down, girls began singing, "New Coon in Town."
I got up, mad, and spoke out free. "Somebody put that man out," said she.
A man called a bouncer attended to me—I'll never go there any more.

I went into a barber shop. He talked until I thought he would never stop.
I cut it short; he misunderstood—clipped down my hair just as close as he could.
He shaved with a razor that scratched like a pig; took off my whiskers and most of my chin.
That was the worst scrape I ever got in—I'll never go there any more.

I struck a place that they called a dive. I was in luck to get out alive.
When the policeman heard my woes, saw my black eyes and my battered nose.
"You've been held up," said the copper fly.
"No, sir; but I've been knocked down!" said I.
Then he laughed, though I couldn't see why.—I'll never go there any more.

HUGE LIST TO GO TO POPE.

Catholic Relief Body Hopes to Send 1,000,000 Names of Members.

A huge book containing the names of at least 1,000,000 residents of the United States of all creeds and nationalities will be presented by the Catholic Near East Welfare Association to Pope Pius XI on Feb. 11, the fifth anniversary of his elevation to the Papacy.

The names in the volume will be those of members of the association, which recently was organized to consolidate all American Catholic agencies engaged in social and welfare work for Russia and the Near East. The task of enrolling 1,000,000 members is under way.

Joseph F. Moore, executive secretary of the organization, the headquarters of which are at 480 Lexington Avenue, said yesterday that the volume will indicate the support for the needy in Russia, Greece and Asia Minor.

Pope Pius XI suggested that all American Catholic agencies striving to provide help for Russia and the Near East merge their activities. He appointed Professor Edmund A. Walsh, Vice President of Georgetown University, to head the association.

Mr. Moore reported that many memberships are being received with contributions ranging from $1 upward.

"It is hoped that by obtaining a membership of at least 1,000,000 sufficient funds will be made available to enlarge the welfare and educational work," Mr. Moore said.

SEEKS HISTORIC CANNON.

White Plains Committee Wants Gun in New York Store as a Marker.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Dec. 18.—An attempt to obtain from Francis Bannerman, New York dealer in firearms, a cannon said to have been used in the battle of White Plains on Oct. 28, 1776, which is now used as a display in front of Bannerman's store on lower Broadway, will be made by members of the Mayor's committee of this city, in charge of placing a Federal marker commemorating the battle on the Bronx River Parkway below Chatterton Hill.

Two types of markers have been submitted, one by the United States Government, which is to spend $2,000, the other by the Westchester County Park Commission.

If the cannon can be obtained it will probably be placed on a stone tablet, the committee declares. Charles Everett Moore, Chairman of the committee, has conferred with representatives of the Park Commission and the United States Army with regard to the design and marker to be used and will call a committee meeting to decide which type is the more acceptable.

A. Stein Freed on Check Charge.

Accused of raising a $32.25 check to $432.25 by Charles C. Bull of the Harvard Club, 27 West Forty-fourth Street, Abraham Stein, 38 years old, proprietor of a night club at 123 West Fifty-second Street, was discharged yesterday by Magistrate Jesse Siliberman in West Side Court when it developed that Bull had left for California and there was no one to testify that Stein had raised the check. Bull left the city last Sunday, detectives testified, taking the check with him to confer with officials of the California bank, on which it had been drawn.

ENGLISH SPINNERS TEST FULL-TIME PRODUCTION

Will Start Soon at Manchester to Try Out Theory Urged by Keynes.

MANCHESTER, England, Dec. 18 (AP).—John Maynard Keynes's theory that full-time production instead of part-time, or restricted output, will offset depression is to be tried at once by the Manchester cotton mills using American yarns.

Dr. Keynes, who is a Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, is author of "The Economic Consequences of the Peace."

Under his plan, approved by the Organization Committee of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners, the practice of curtailing American yarn spinning, which has been in effect almost continuously since 1920, will be abandoned.

Mr. Keynes insisted that short time had the effect, by restricting output, of increasing the ratio of overhead charges and increasing the cost of the manufactured article, to the advantage of Japanese and other foreign competitors. He urged mass production, with fuller utilization of American raw material.

As a result of his plan British spinners will now work six full days a week for the first time in nearly six years in those mills using American yarns, and American cotton growers, faced with heavy losses because of the second large crop in two years, may be able to sell part of their surplus.

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—There is a large "if" in the theory which Manchester (England) manufacturers are about to apply to their cotton mills, according to Russell T. Fisher, Secretary of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers. He said:

"If the English mills by this means can reduce their production costs to a point which will bring their products within the buying power of their once great markets of China, Japan and India and can meet the foreign competition, they will succeed.

"But it is to be remembered that those countries have not enjoyed the prosperity of other parts of the world; the man there has reduced his consumption of cotton cloth or eliminated it entirely, and at the same time Japan in the last twenty years has increased her spindles by 500 per cent. and China by 400 per cent.

"If the British cloth cannot find a sale there, it will mean cheap cloth will be dumped on the American or other markets. New England manufacturers have found that with a trade-marked product one can push the mills to capacity and force the salesmen to sell it, but that it is far different with grade cloth sold from the looms."

HUGHES ASKS HISTORY AID.

Appeals for $1,000,000 to Help the American Association.

An appeal for support of the American Historical Association, signed by Charles E. Hughes, asks for contributions to the amount of $1,000,000, the interest on which will enable it to carry on its activities. These are said to be a survey of the field of American history, the organization of groups of scholars for the cooperative study of historical backgrounds of current problems in America, the award of small grants to individual scholars to enable them to meet the expenses of research, the publication of studies in history, the improvement and expansion of the bibliographical services of the association, including a bibliography of travel in America, and for the general purposes of the association.

It is proposed also to improve the study of history teaching in schools and to purchase a house in Washington, D. C., to house the association. This will serve as a centre for students visiting the capital. The New York headquarters of the society is at 110 Library, Columbia University.

JOINS EDWARDS CLAIMANTS.

English Woman Wants Share in Reputed $250,000,000 Fortune.

Copyright, 1926, by The New York Times Company
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 18.—Participation in a claim to a fortune in America which is reputed to amount to $250,000,000 is asserted by Mrs. Knibbs of Coventry. She says she can prove descent from William Edwards, brother of a British officer, Robert Edwards, to whom, so the story goes, was granted for bravery in the American War of Independence land on which much of New York City is built. Robert had four brothers, two of whom settled in Coventry, where William is still remembered as a local benefactor.

Mrs. Knibbs's claim, it is reported, is not regarded lightly in legal circles, and she is spending her life savings to further it.

An association of Edwards claimants was organized in this country several years ago to advance their mutual interests, which are in the hands of attorneys.

D. K. E. CONVENTION HERE.

Delegates From 44 Universities to Meet Dec. 27, 28 and 29.

Delta Kappa Epsilon will hold its eighty-second annual convention at the D. K. E. clubhouse, 5 East Fifty-first Street, and at the Hotel Roosevelt on Dec. 27, 28 and 29. Delegates are expected from forty-four universities, including three in Canada.

The program begins with a smoker on the evening of Dec. 27 at the D. K. E. clubhouse. The dinner will be held at the Roosevelt Dec. 29. Ex-Senator Albert J. Beveridge, Honorary President of the fraternity, will address the diners, and Mary Mellish, formerly a soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will sing.

An alumni luncheon will be held at the Roosevelt Dec. 28. The speakers include Senator Copeland and Howard S. Harrington of England. Senator Wadsworth also has been invited.

A special train will bring many delegates and alumni from Chicago, and special cars will run from Boston, Buffalo, Washington and Pittsburgh.

DARES BROTHER TO DUEL.

Marriage of Paul Dubonnet to Jean Nash Causes Family Rift.

Copyright, 1926, by The Chicago Tribune Co.

PARIS, Dec. 18.—The recent marriage of Jean Nash, the so-called best-dressed woman in the world, and the wealthy Paul Dubonnet, 54 years old, threatens to cause a duel between Paul and his older brother, André.

The brothers a couple of days ago had a fist fight in the Bois du Boulogne. Paul gave two black eyes, a split lip and a bloody nose to his brother, and André demands swords or pistols.

The trouble arose because, instead of making a contract with his bride allocating to her a certain portion of the Dubonnet estate, in accordance with the French custom, Paul had agreed to a community interest clause, which provides that half of what he has is hers and half of hers is his.

CITY WELL SUPPLIED WITH GREEN FOOD

Florida Sends 50 Carloads of String Beans in a Week, Market Report Shows.

TEXAS SHIPMENTS HEAVY

Other Southern and Western States Provide Variety of Vegetables —Apples Abundant.

Abundant supplies of fresh string beans were shipped from Florida to New York last week, and the wholesale prices at this season were considered very reasonable, according to the weekly review of local food markets made public yesterday by Dr. Arthur E. Albrecht, New York Director of the State Department of Farms and Markets. The review says:

"Approximately fifty carloads arrived this week and on Friday various varieties of green string beans sold from $1.50 to $3.50, mostly $2 to $3 per twenty-eight-quart hamper.

"As the season for Eastern cauliflower draws to a close, the West, with her more salubrious climate, now steps in to fill her place. Crates of nine to fourteen heads from California sold at from $1.50 to $2.50, principally $2 to $2.25.

Celery Supply Exceeds Demand.

"Receipts of celery were somewhat in excess of trade requirements on Friday and offerings not strictly fancy were almost neglected. New York State best stock wholesaled at $2 to $2.75 per crate, whereas the finest California arrivals brought around $5.

"The Texas shipping season has become quite important. During the week the New York market received the following varieties of vegetables: string beans, beets, broccoli, cabbage, carrots, chicory, escarole, egg plants, lima beans, parsley, green peas, green corn, green peppers, radishes, romaine, spinach, squash, tomatoes and turnips.

"Despite the fine quality of South Carolina radishes the cold weather has curtailed the demand, in many instances sales barely covering transportation costs. Fresh green peas were available on Friday from California, Arizona and Mexico. The shipments were all packed in crates of about forty-five pounds each, and changed hands principally at $6.50 to $7 per crate. Several small shipments from Florida sold at $2 to $4.25 per 28-quart hamper.

Virginia Spinach Plentiful.

"Virginia abundantly supplied the local market with spinach. A large volume of the offerings, however, were ordinary in quality. Bushel baskets jobbed out from 40 cents to $1. On the other hand, Texas spinach, excellent in quality, but limited in quantity, sold at $1.12 to $1.25 a bushel.

"Supplies of Western iceberg type lettuce were liberal. The finest from California and Arizona commanded $3.50 to $4.50 per crate, but off-grade sold from $1.50 to $2.50. Receipts of Southern stock were only moderate.

"New York State barreled apples were in fair supply. Fancy fruit of all kinds, when available, sold readily, but ordinary and poor dragged. Grade A 2¼-inch Baldwins brought from $2.50 to $3.50 per barrel, Greenings $2.50 to $4 and McIntoshes $3.50 to $5. Combined cold storage holdings of apples on Dec. 1 for the country were about 12 per cent. greater than a year ago and one-third heavier than the five-year average for December. The supply of boxed apples was 37 per cent. greater than the recent average for this month. December usually is the peak month for total stocks in cold storage, and withdrawals occur gradually from now until next Summer.

FOOD PRICES INCREASE 1 PER CENT. IN A MONTH

But They Are More Than 3 Per Cent. Lower Than Last Year, Says Government Report.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18.—The retail food index issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor shows for Nov. 15 an increase of 1 per cent. since Oct. 15, a decrease of about 3 1-3 per cent. since Nov. 15, 1925, and an increase of a little more than 54 per cent. since Nov. 15, 1913.

During the month from Oct. 15 to Nov. 15 eight articles on which monthly prices were secured increased as follows: Strictly fresh eggs, 13 per cent.; potatoes, 5 per cent.; butter, 3 per cent.; storage eggs and navy beans, 2 per cent., and plate beef, fresh milk and cheese, 1 per cent. Twenty articles decreased: Pork chops, 10 per cent.; lard, 4 per cent.; canned red salmon and rice, 3 per cent.; ham, prunes and oranges, 2 per cent.; sirloin steak, round steak, rib roast, bacon, leg of lamb, hens, oleomargarine, canned peas and raisins, 1 per cent., and chuck roast, vegetable lard substitute tea and coffee, less than five-tenths of 1 per cent.

During the month the average cost of food increased in 42 of the 51 cities as follows: Boston, Buffalo, Fall River, Rochester and Scranton, 3 per cent.; Bridgeport, Columbus, Denver, Little Rock, Manchester, New Haven, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Portland, Me., Providence and Springfield, Ill., 2 per cent.; Baltimore, Butte, Charleston, S. C., Chicago, Dallas, Detroit, Indianapolis, Louisville, Milwaukee, Newark, Norfolk, Peoria, St. Louis and Salt Lake City, 1 per cent., and Atlanta, Cleveland, Houston, Los Angeles, Memphis, Mobile, Omaha, St. Paul, San Francisco, Savannah and Washington, D. C., less than five-tenths of 1 per cent.

There was a decrease in the following five cities: Jacksonville and Seattle, 1 per cent., and Minneapolis, Portland, Ore., and Richmond less than five-tenths of 1 per cent. In Birmingham, Cincinnati, Kansas City and New Orleans there was no change in the month.

For the year period Nov. 15, 1925, to Nov. 15, 1926, 50 cities showed decreases, including New York, where the full advance averaged 2 per cent.

As compared with the average cost in the year 1913, food on Nov. 15, 1926, was 73 per cent. higher in Chicago; 72 per cent. in Washington; 70 per cent. in Baltimore and Richmond; 69 per cent. in Buffalo, Detroit and Scranton; 68 per cent. in Philadelphia; 67 per cent. in Birmingham and New York; 65 per cent. in Boston, Milwaukee and St. Louis; 38 per cent. in Salt Lake City.

Plans Home for Blind Girls.

The Fanny J. Crosby Memorial for Blind Girls has issued an appeal for $700,000 to provide a hospital, sanitarium and home in Lakewood, N. J., for blind girls. Miss Crosby was a hymn writer who lost her sight in infancy and was the first founder and first President of the society. The Treasurer is the Rev. Edwin C. Holman and the office of the organization is 75 Fifth Avenue.

TO AID PARENT TEACHING.

Institute to Be Held Next Month at Child Study Association.

A ten-day institute on "Parental Education" will be held for men and women engaged in work with parents and for other persons preparing for such work, Jan. 17 to 28, at the headquarters of the Child Study Association of America, 54 West Seventy-fourth Street, according to announcement yesterday.

The institute will consist of lectures, round-table conferences and opportunities to visit study groups, clinics, juvenile courts, special classes, institutions, &c. Among the speakers will be Professors Michael F. Guyer, Ernest R. Groves and Joseph Jastrow and Drs. Helen T. Wooley and Benjamin C. Gruenberg.

BANK WILL BUILD GARAGE.

Trust Company of Jersey City Will Care for Patrons' Autos.

A garage for its patrons will be erected by the Trust Company of Jersey City as its contribution to the solution of the parking problem, General William P. Heppenheimer, its President, announced yesterday.

Seven lots adjoining the bank's main office in Bergen Avenue have been purchased and the small buildings now occupying them will be razed to make room for the garage. The garage will be connected with the bank by a covered passage to protect the patrons in inclement weather.

"This is the only solution of the parking problem for large buildings," said President Heppenheimer in announcing the project.

A stock dividend of 19 per cent. also was announced by the trust company. Stock of the value of $570,000 will be distributed to stockholders.

EUROPE'S STEEL TRUST ON ROAD TO SUCCESS

British Are Friendly and Germans Sign Rail Accord, While Poles Promise Adhesion.

Copyright, 1926, by The New York Times Company.
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 18.—That the recent Paris meeting of European steel producers was a remarkably successful step toward broadening the scope of the steel and rail trusts was revealed today.

Although the British steel makers announced that they could not yet adhere to the steel accord, they have appointed a committee to follow its working and have promised benevolent abstention until the day when they see their way clear to join.

On the other hand, the German railmakers signed the European Railmakers' Association compact, which they refused to do two months ago.

The Polish steel makers who attended the meeting represented the industry in their country unofficially, as there is still no national organization capable of accepting or rejecting membership in the trust.

The Poles promised, however, to attempt to constitute a national body in time for the next steel meeting in the Spring, and after being fully informed of all details of the organization gave the impression that they would adhere.

The Czechoslovak group, which comprises the steel industry of Czechoslovakia, Austria and former Hungary, accepted in principle participation in the steel trust with an annual tonnage quota of 2,000,000 tons, or 7.2 per cent. This percentage, when adherence is completed, will not be deducted from the existing 100 per cent. but will be added thereto, making the annual output of the organization 107.2 per cent.

The Czechoslovak group announced that its final adherence might be governed by the action of the Polish group, which is its immediate rival. It has, however, abandoned its request for a monopoly sale of steel and rails in Balkan countries and has agreed definitively to join the rail trust with a quota of 4 per cent. The total rail production will, therefore, be 103 per cent. henceforth.

Limitation of production in the first quarter of 1927 was due chiefly to the ending of the British coal strike. Belgium was not interested in this decision because her quota remains unchanged as long as her 100 per cent. output is less than 30,000,000 tons annually. France is only indirectly concerned, because of the industrial crisis facing the country.

Luxemburg and Germany, however, have plentiful unfilled orders for the first quarter of 1927, but have accepted a reduction of the total output because they wished to retain solidarity with the other producers. For this reason it is certain that the German steel makers will have to pay fines for exceeding the 1927 quotas.

This is sufficient evidence that all the countries concerned are content, at least for the present, to adhere strictly to the spirit of the steel trust and will not turn against it, because in the course of time its regulations would operate against them. As there probably will be cases in which the process will be reversed the course adopted is not as altruistic as it seems, but it is at least a guarantee of the solidity of the organization.

Asks Investigation in Sacco Case.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18 (AP).—Investigation of charges against the Department of Justice in connection with the case of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, sentenced to death in Massachusetts for murder during a hold-up, was sought in a resolution introduced today by Representative Sabath of Illinois. He said it had been charged that two former agents of the department secured false evidence against Sacco and Vanzetti.

The patented "rock-a-by" base keeps Smokador from being knocked over. Nothing can be spilled. Easy to clean Ashes drop through to the bowl —no odor—it does not tip over!

Easy to empty —unscrew stem and empty bowl

CONFIDENTIALLY, there's one trouble about Smokador. When you decide what a great gift it will make for Jim or Bill, you're altogether too certain to say, "What about giving myself one, too?" And if you don't happen to get the idea, your wife is sure to.

Goodby to messy ashstands

Smokador is the smartest—and most convenient—thing in smoking equipment today. It puts an end to messy ash-trays, spilled ashes, scarred tables and holes burned into rugs.

Cigarette and cigar stubs, pipe ashes, used matches are simply dropped through the hollow stem into the air-tight bowl—where they are out of sight and out of smell.

No more powdery ashes blown around the room by a chance draught from an open window.

Danger from fire is eliminated—forgotten smokes left in the cleverly devised Snuffer Clips are snuffed out automatically when they burn up to the clips.

No spilling—easy to clean

No spilling—if anyone accidentally knocks against Smokador, the patented "rock-a-by" base brings it immediately to an upright position. A single turn of the stem disconnects the bowl for emptying.

Smokador is made of durable metal—graceful in line with a particularly attractive finish. It blends charmingly with the furnishings of any room.

Insist on the "genuine" Smokador

Do not be deceived into buying an imitation of the genuine patented Smokador. Look for the name, Smokador, on the match-box holder, or on the bottom of the bowl. This trade mark is the guarantee of genuineness, and will protect you against mistakes. Smokador is the ashless ashstand with the patented "rock-a-by" base, that does not tip over. Insist on it.

"Smart as the Ritz"

Six colors to choose from: mahogany, dark bronze, Chinese red, olive green, willow green and Roman gold. Ask for Smokador at your dealer's.

Or send $10.50—check or money order—($11.00 west of the Mississippi). Your Smokador will be delivered to you promptly through the nearest dealer.

THE DISAPPOINTMENT.

One has but to read the newspaper comment all over the country on the outcome of the Fall-Doheny trial to see that the verdict of the jury carried with it almost everywhere a sense of chagrin and something like resentment. What the basis of this is, it is important to observe. It was not a case of a vengeful feeling disappointed. No one had any personal animosity against ex-Secretary FALL or Mr. DOHENY. The attitude of the public would have been much the same if the two accused had been entirely different persons. The true explanation of the impatience and discontent which have been manifested since the failure of the prosecution in Washington lies elsewhere.

It is due partly to a belief that our administration of the criminal law is defective. This does not mean that the actual jury in Washington is believed to have been incompetent or recreant. The uneasy feeling goes back of that. First of all, there were the long and exasperating and apparently needless delays before Messrs. FALL and DOHENY were finally brought into court. Then there was the complex system of statutory law, throwing so many safeguards around indicted persons, and setting up so many intricate rules of procedure, that if was easy for the real issue to be clouded and for a jury of ordinary men to become confused. The result at Washington, as we have it now, cannot fail to impart a new impulse to the movement for a reform of American criminal procedure.

The most serious ground of dissatisfaction remains to be mentioned. People felt the shame of alleged corruption in the National Government. They had come to fear that if the whole truth were told about what went on in 1921 and 1922, odious and disgusting things would be uncovered rivaling the scandals of the second Administration of President GRANT. It was this asserted and feared corruption which the ordinary American citizen desired to see cut to the bone. The long postponed trial of ex-Secretary FALL and Mr. DOHENY was watched for in the hope that it would do that thing thoroughly. It is the apparent failure which leaves the country baffled and disappointed. But we must not fail to note that in the very act we get fresh encouragement from the way in which our democracy makes it plain, at every opportunity, that it will not tolerate corrupt officials, but is eager to see them exposed and punished.

In one of his speeches soon after he became President, Mr. COOLIDGE expressed in a few but pointed words the abhorrence which Americans must experience whenever they are led to believe that corruption is eating into the activities of the Government. That feeling of repulsion is obvious and dominant in what the newspapers and public men everywhere are today saying about the Washington trial.

MAKING SANTA CLAUS REAL.

What we call the Christmas spirit has to be personified for children. They can scarcely imagine abstract good-will; they must think of gifts coming somehow from a definite giver; there must be some mysterious being to whom they make their needs and wishes known. They do not expect or desire to see him at Christmas time, or to be able to thank him in person, but their thoughts and their fancy have for generation after generation taken the convenient form of Santa Claus, because he seems to them best to embody the sentiments and kindly consideration associated with Christmas.

In this very true sense, the gifts made to the sick, the crippled, the homeless, the poverty-stricken, through the Hundred Neediest Cases Fund, are beautifully in line with the finest Santa Claus tradition of childhood. The benefactions come impersonally. The recipients never see the actual givers. It is as if somehow the acutely felt and vaguely expressed need had been met by some unseen ministering angel. And on the other side, too, the lack of direct contact must make the contributors to the Hundred Neediest Cases feel as if they were playing the actual rôle of Santa Claus. They give, as it were, out of the unknown. The good they do is done, so far as the objects of their charity are concerned, without name or individual identity.

All this is a gracious and winning aspect of the Hundred Neediest Cases Fund which, we are convinced, carries a powerful appeal for many. The immediate effort is for those in dire need in New York, but, as has happened in other years, many kind-hearted people in other cities, even in distant parts of the country, have been moved to join in this work of relief. They see in it both a means of doing good and of sharing in a privilege. While they themselves are actuated by the emotions of benevolence which surge up in us all at Christmas, they also feel, as no doubt do the large number of local contributors, that they are making the season's spirit of goodwill a vital thing in many lives, and are causing Santa Claus himself to appear very real in the wistful eyes of the boys and girls among the Hundred Neediest Cases who do not know to whom else to turn in their distress.

BUILDING WISELY.

Nothing ought to block the magnificent building program for Washington now under way. Senator SMOOT's bill appropriating $25,000,000 to purchase the rest of the triangle south of Pennsylvania Avenue has passed the Senate. The site is to be the centre of the proposed development. Here are to arise monumental buildings for the Departments of Commerce, Justice and Labor, and ultimately there will be a splendid avenue from the Capitol through the Mall past the Washington and Lincoln Memorials and over the projected Memorial Bridge to Arlington. It is a vision that may well kindle the imagination.

This $25,000,000 for the purchase of land is apart from the $50,000,000 already authorized for building over the next five years. Senator SMOOT suggests that it might be well to accelerate that program and spend $35,000,000 within the next year and a half. But here another consideration enters. As a general principle it is not altogether wise to embark on large-scale public works in periods of prosperity. On this point the report of the Committee on Business Cycles, of which OWEN D. YOUNG was Chairman, had this to say:

> Holding back public works and private construction for periods of depression not only gives employment to large numbers of workers when it is most needed, but creates a demand for raw materials for construction which in turn stimulates other industries to offer employment. * * * If it were possible for a smaller percentage of public works projects to be undertaken in periods when private industry is active, so that more work might be done during periods when private industry is slack, the Government would not compete with private industry to so great an extent in times of prosperity, and thus would not be a factor in the inflation of money rates, prices of materials and employment.

All this has only a limited application to the present case. A few millions one way or the other will hardly affect the business cycle. But it would be well for Congress to set the right example to States and municipalities, the more so as this project is but part of a national public buildings enterprise involving the expenditure of no less than $165,000,000. The Independent, discussing what to do with the Treasury surplus, and having this same point in mind, suggests that a substantial part of the surplus "should "be funded for construction operations "later on." There is a simpler way out, and Senator SMOOT has perhaps unwittingly discovered it. Spend money on land first. That is a safe place to put it out of reach of the business cycle. Then stick to a program of actual construction which will spread the work over a period of years, with such adjustments as may be necessary in the interest of economy and the Government's immediate needs.

NOT IN THE GUIDE BOOK.

The spirit of KARL MARX, looking down from the battlements of the Materialistic Conception of History upon the surface of three continents, must be sorely beset. The father of scientific Socialism has difficulty in identifying his children. He sees the right worshipers in the wrong pew. The doctrines and slogans of Marxian Socialism are being applied and repeated, yet nothing moves according to specifications. MARX taught that the transition from capitalistic to the socialistic commonwealth would first be worked out in the most highly industrialized countries. The United States, Great Britain and Germany were, as the doctors say, indicated. Marxian Socialism, as Bolshevism, arrived first in the most industrially backward of European countries, in peasant Russia. Outside of Russia the verbal formulas of Bolshevism today are most frequently repeated in peasant China, where Canton speaks of a "committee" system of government. "Soviet" is the Russian word for committee or council. On the American Continent the loudest echoes of the Bolshevist experiment are in peasant Mexico. The struggle for the overthrow of capitalism has apparently been initiated in those countries where, comparatively speaking, there is no capitalism. The reconquest of Surplus Value for the masses is waged or immediately predicted in countries where there is no surplus of any kind.

In another respect the event sharply departs from the forecast. The victory of Socialism was to march shoulder to shoulder with the victory of the international spirit. Capitalism was war. The workers of the world were called upon to unite. What the spirit of MARX observes today is internationalism fostered by the old economic order, nationalism exploited by advocates of the socialistic order. At Geneva there is internationalism in practice. At Moscow there is internationalism in phrase, but the survival of the Soviet Government has been conditioned by Russian nationalism. The Soviet's own claims emphasize foreign intervention and blockade as the hammers that forged Russian unity under the Soviet. Russian history of the last five years has been the story of nationalist peasant pressure molding the original international theory into strange forms or utterly out of existence. German Communists of the original faith are now predicting for Russia an uprising of the working class against STALIN's nationalist peasant State. So in China the slogans may sound Bolshevist, but the motive force is nationalism versus the foreigner. Mexican "Bolshevism" is nothing but an echo. The real force is still the Foreigner.

Yet in one way the brooding spirit of the Father of Socialism can insist that the formulas of half a century ago were right. KARL MARX could say "I told you so." Socialism came first in non-industrial Russia and is being played with in peasant China. But has Socialism come to stay? There is a régime in Russia which calls itself Socialist, but of Socialism there is very little in Russia. What will happen in China if the problem of the foreigner has been disposed of? Will Mexico be as fond of Soviet Ambassadors when the difficulties with the United States have been disposed of? No attempt has as yet been made to test that half of the Marxian theory which saw Socialism winning in the industrial countries. The other half of the theory, that Socialism cannot win in the peasant countries, is by way of being demonstrated.

A PHILOSOPHIC "BOBBY."

If London Bridge were falling down, our regret might be tempered by the thought that MACAULAY'S everlasting New Zealander might be on it and be submerged. If Westminster Abbey and the British Constitution were both in ruins, the lover of old customs would be hardly more pained than he is to hear that the London "bobby," if so much newer, is much less hallowed, has been newyorkified into a "cop." Let us compromise on "policeman." About 4 A. M. a reporter of The Morning Post saw a policeman watching "a shabby little man with a carpenter's bag," an article that in the small hours looks most suspicious to constabulary eyes:

> "Here—come here!"
> The little man turned reluctantly.
> "What have you got in that bag, governor?"
> "Tools—I got a job to do down in Kent."
> "Let's have a look."
> The little man can either stand on his dignity or drop the bag and run.
> "It's a cop," he says fatalistically.

The bag is loaded with pieces of lead pipe and brass taps. Off to the police station goes the policeman with his prisoner, reporting the deadly confession: "It's a cop." Own brother to the New York policeman in good nature, savoir faire and an indulgent if somewhat cynical study of human behavior, the "bobby" deserves to be called by his right name; but the last of the Peelites seems to have gone. As general counselor, philosopher, people's lawyer, he has a host of clients. He is often addressed as "young man" by his consultants, especially by women. "Tell me the rights of this, young man," and he offers his rough good sense on tort and trespass and dispossession and what not, like his legal colleagues in blue here.

Old New Yorkers sometimes wonder at the comparative disappearance of fisticuffs. The thrasonical, unmeant challenges continue. This is the usual battle:

> "You will?"
> "I will!"
> "It'd take a man to punch me on the nose!"
> "Would it?"
> "Yes, it would!"
> A slight more or less harmless scuffle. The policeman moves silently from the shadow. "Now then!" His tone is rather amused. "Now, you chaps, pop off home!"

Such is the counsel of prudence. "A "fighting man told our Inspector: 'If a "'man insults you, knock him down; if "'he gets up to fight, run like hell'; "and there's a lot in it." There's a lot in this amiable pragmatist; but surely he can't have said this:

> An American lady says to me the other day: "Why don't you carry a pistol the same as the police do in New York?" I says to her: "Madam, the police "don't carry pistols in this country be- "cause there's nobody here bad enough "to shoot."

The Conservative reporter wrote that and chuckled.

WEALTH'S RESPONSIBILITY.

ADAM SMITH, in his "Wealth of Nations," devotes a chapter to the "natural progress of opulence," but he nowhere speaks of the moral responsibility of those who have shared in that opulence—the obligation which comes to the private citizen who has amassed material wealth or that even more precious, though intangible, wealth, reputation. "Thou shalt not steal" has been written into the laws of every people. But it has been applied only to taking by one from another. There is a stealing from one's self which, while not prohibited by any statute, not only injures self but indirectly takes from others, and in this double filching subtracts something from the nation's wealth, instead of adding to it. A wealth which outshone that of Ormus and of Ind or the barbaric pearl and gold showered by the hand of the gorgeous East but furnished the throne on which Satanic genius was raised to its "bad eminence." Who knows how to use wealth and does so use it, alone has wealth. Who morally misuses it wastes not only his own substance but that of the State.

How much poorer our whole nation is because of that which has been revealed of the surreptitious commerce between great wealth and public office under the cover of friendship. Not only has the one who gave made himself "poor indeed" in the real riches of life, but he has not enriched him for whom he robbed himself. All of which utters a warning to those who, having made great fortunes, think of them as theirs to do with as they will, if they transgress no statute. It is only man's own integrity, his resolute character in the face of temptation, his sense of responsibility to his fellow-men for the right use of riches which he has gathered not alone of his own effort, however great his genius, that will conserve for him and those who come after him the real wealth of nations. One who does an unworthy thing with his wealth may defraud millions of others with himself.

ON THE TRAIL OF SANTA FE.

Santa Fé is at war with the world, or, to be more strictly accurate, with that portion of the world which consists of the ladies of the Southwestern Federated Women's Clubs. They are in love with Santa Fé, but Santa Fé does not reciprocate the feeling. Worse still, the ladies have made up their minds to storm Santa Fé, and its citizens have discovered traitors in their midst willing to do the ladies a pleasure. Not that the citizens of Santa Fé are lacking in chivalry. But there are ladies and ladies—those who are of the elect and those who seek election.

Santa Fé's shyness is well explained by that synthetic son of Santa Fé, WITTER BYNNER, poet and anti-Rotarian, in an article elsewhere in today's TIMES. Santa Fé is "different" and seeks to live its own life as it chooses. It is more interested in man's relation to the sky than to the Social Register. It finds space more important than time, ease preferable to vexation. Not unlike that cynical SOLOMON who declared that "it "is better to dwell in the wilderness than "with a contentious and an angry wo- "man," the citizens of Santa Fé have proclaimed to the world their desire to live in peace and quiet in the midst of the gorgeous desert that stretches from the Rio Grande to the Mountains of the Blood of Christ, without having the ladies' clubs of the Southwest make Santa Fé their Summer stamping ground.

Among the synthetic sons—and daughters—of Santa Fé are MARY AUSTIN and ALICE CORBIN HENDERSON. VACHEL LINDSEY and WILLA CATHER have paused there for a few moments of content and peace. It is the home of artists of all sorts, for it is one of the few spots in America where there is timeless leisure and where Americans are not ashamed to enjoy natural beauty for its own sake. Its isolation has been its strength and its salvation. If it now fall to 30,000 vehement women who look upon artists with the same curious eye that they gaze on Indians or on cliff-dwellings, gone will be that peace which now reigns supreme, and the muse will flee to the mountains, probably unpursued save by the occupants of rubberneck wagons.

In Santa Fé some low persons speak disrespectfully of the artists as "mud hut nuts," and look upon 30,000 ladies as so many new customers. The artists, say these old-timers, exploited Santa Fé. Why should not Santa Fé now exploit them and exhibit them as part of the "scenery"? Between the two factions the battle is hotly raging. Even the "interests" do not remain aloof, for it appears that the transcontinental railroad which for so many years had disregarded everything about Santa Fé except its name has been taking tourists through the city, and has even trained guides in the "patter" that is used to describe the Indian pottery and architecture and the other archaeological features of the Santa Fé country. Presumably Santa Fé is doomed to be gazed upon by innumerable profane eyes, and the isolation of three centuries is to be broken.

"COME TO BRITAIN."

There is a "Come to Britain" movement. American tourists are desired. If this enterprise succeeds, Americans will not be the only beneficiaries; aside from revenue, there will be a distinct gain to the people of the British Isles in learning what creature comforts, conveniences and good food the American visitors are accustomed to at home and would expect in Great Britain. Undoubtedly the Americans would learn something to their advantage, too. The Department for Overseas Trade is behind the "Come to Britain" propaganda. A British tourist federation has been suggested to excel, if possible, the arrangements made on the Continent to welcome tourists, provide for them and speed them courteously as departing guests. The Spectator is enthusiastic over the prospect of filling Great Britain with paying American tourists. "France," it says, "derives nearly "£70,000,000 from her tourist trade each "year, nearly twice as much as we need "to pay the American debt." This artless observation might excite a suspicion in some minds that the Department for Overseas Trade is conspiring to make the Americans pay twice over the interest on the British debt.

The Spectator calculates that the 20,000,000 motor-car owners in the United States are potential visitors to Europe. Britannia should make ready for her share of them. It is pointed out that "many of our country hotels in Great Britain have been run by C3 minds." That is also true of the United States. There is one thing the British hotel proprietor plumes himself on: "Americans "are charmed by the courtesy shown "them when traveling in England; they "appreciate the personal service and "personal touch to be found here." About the personal touch the Americans are not so sure. "No hotel," says The Spectator, "can claim to rank as first class without central heating." Americans visiting England in the Winter will agree. They will feel like cheering when they read this:

> Running water must be provided in every bedroom, and there must be a plentiful supply of bathrooms. Electric reading lights and telephones should be placed by every bed; the electric light switch should be accessible from the bed. Larger wardrobes should be provided, where the visitor can hang his clothes. Traveling Americans like to hang their coats and trousers; they do not fold them up and put them in drawers, as many Englishmen do.
> Next, food. The British hotel keepers, in the provinces at least, will have to brace up:
> Americans are great fruit eaters. Plentiful supplies of fruit should be supplied at all meals. They are fonder of salads than we are; therefore, lettuce, tomatoes, celery and radishes should be always available in season.
> The coffee must be stronger and actually taste like the ground berry. Nothing is said about tea. That is supposed to be delicious in England. There will be no dissent from the statement that "British private gardens are among the most beautiful in the world." The English-Speaking Union is making arrangements to have American visitors admitted to "the chief gardens in England." Are the 20,000,000 all to be let in and left to their own devices? In this country only too many of them cannot be trusted among flowers. Here they invade private gardens and help themselves. And no wild flower, however rare, is safe from them. Awful are their depredations among the dogwoods, shad bushes and even apple trees. If thousands of American tourists are invited into private gardens over there, war between the United States and Great Britain may follow. But The Spectator means well. It is building better than it knows. The "Come to Britain" movement might make the Britons indefatigable fruit and vegetable eaters and devoted to modern plumbing.

A LESSON IN ART.

A large number of admiring friends celebrated last week with Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK her fiftieth anniversary upon the stage. Such an anniversary is indeed something to celebrate; and though opera singers have a way of living to a green old age, few of them are able to look back upon so long a period of active labor in their profession and to look forward at the same time to something still to come. There is an important lesson in Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK's career for budding opera singers, or singers of any kind, if they would only pay some heed to it; which, it may be feared, they will not. The young, whether operatically inclined or otherwise, seem less disposed to pay heed to lessons than ever before.

The lesson in this case is the need of much hard and thorough work of the right kind in complete preparation before beginning the active and laborious career of a stage singer. It means the devotion of a good many years and involves the thorough mastery of a difficult art. Those who study the lives of singers will note how very few have escaped the exactions of severe study in early life, and how exceptionally Godgifted they had to be to do so. Many have begun young—Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK, who cheerfully admits sixty-five years, made her début at the age of sixteen, but it was only after serious preparation continued long afterward. It is the preparation and acquirement of correct artistic principles that make for a long career.

It must be said in justice to the hasty young artists who wish for an immediate beginning that there is some excuse for them. Circumstances today conspire against them. The impresarios seek eagerly for young and brilliant voices and come with alluring offers. They know that, in the operas of a modern style, at least a plausible beginning may be made by singers not yet in possession of all the laboriously won secrets of their art. There is the pressure of admiring "home folks" who look for an immediate success. Furthermore, the operas written in the older styles that require perfect vocalization for their proper performance, and at the same time are the indispensable means of acquiring such vocalization, have gradually been going out of fashion, yielding to a newer taste of the public. They no longer make their old appeal, except when they are interpreted by artists of the most brilliant attainments, and then as a kind of bonne bouche, and not as a steady musical diet. Not the least important element in the problem is the increasing scarcity of teachers competent to teach. So the young aspirants for operatic fame are beset on all sides by temptations, pressures and discouragements which may easily make them overlook the larger good and the more distant future. Is it surprising that the young and ambitious listen to the siren song, enter too soon upon their careers, and live to rue a course that perhaps there was no one to warn them against?

The great examples of what fine voices firmly founded upon the old principles may accomplish in the newer music are not yet forgotten. What the DE RESZKE brothers, LILLI LEHMANN, EMIL FISCHER, LILLIAN NORDICA, Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK and others of that time, who were trained in the elder school, accomplished in the Wagnerian music-drama is not yet entirely legendary. Their excellence in it was due not only to their natural gifts, but also, in large part, to their training and skill. And the long service that others still more famous but not destined by nature to the so-called "dramatic" rôles have given the public was also due to the fact that what they did they did rightly. One of the ominous facts in the musical life of today is that the training for art is less and less considered. The voices are not lacking. It can hardly be that nature is breaking her molds. It is man that is at fault.

The "International Jew" Myth.

Just suppose that a Congressional Committee of Inquiry into The Dearborn Independent's charges against the international Jew were in session and the eminent citizen whose mouthpiece that journal is understood to be should take the witness stand. Examination by counsel for the committee might very well be expected to proceed, partly and approximately, as follows:

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Q.—It is your contention, sir, that the international Jew is in control of the Federal Reserve System?

A.—That's right. The way things are going we shan't have a stick of timber standing ten years from now.

Q.—Aren't you confusing the Federal Reserve with the Forest Reserve?

A.—Maybe. But if the Jews get control of the national forests it will happen just as I said.

Q.—Could you designate by name any individual or group of individuals who are employing the Federal Reserve for Jewish purposes?

A.—I think it's safer not to. Don't you?

Q.—It is your contention that the international Jew is in control of all financial centres of government. What evidence have you on that point?

A.—I have been told that when Secretary Mellon stopped over in New York on his return from France he went down to the Neighborhood Playhouse and took in a performance of "The Dybbuk."

Q.—Do you suggest that Secretary Mellon went in on a pass?

A.—I am morally convinced he did.

Q.—I show you here the photographic reproduction of the theatrical advertising pages of several New York papers and call your attention to the fact that during Mr. Mellon's stay in New York there was another show running at the Neighborhood Playhouse.

A.—That only demonstrates the Jewish control over the press.

Q.—Does your objection to naming names extend to giving us the name of the authority who supplies you with your financial information?

A.—Well, it was the same fellow who taught navigation to Rosika Schwimmer.

TEACHINGS OF HISTORY.

Q.—Now, it is your further belief that the international Jew controls the revolutionary elements of the world as well as the ultra-conservative elements?

A.—Where does it say that?

Q.—In The Dearborn Independent.

A.—Then I guess I believe it.

Q.—On what grounds?

A.—The lessons of history.

Q.—Then you do believe in history?

A.—I believe in histories about the Jews. And let me say that on the general subject of history I have been treated very unfairly by the press.

Q.—I am sorry, sir. To remove an erroneous popular impression would you mind telling us whether Arnold Bennett wrote the "Old Wives' Tale" before or after his infamous transactions with Major André?

A.—He did it shortly after his return from the North Pole with Byrd and just before he founded The New York Herald.

Q.—Ah! Coming back to the original question, don't you think that if the Jews are both ultra-conservatives and revolutionaries that lets them pretty well out?

A.—No. On the contrary, I think it gets them coming and going.

ART AND TECHNOLOGY.

Q.—It is your assertion, then, that Jewish influence is debauching the American theatre?

A.—That's right.

Q.—Can you cite, as an instance, one or two plays from the current Broadway season?

A.—I never go to New York. I don't like the process-servers there.

Q.—Do you think that our theatre as a whole stands higher or lower than it did thirty years ago?

A.—I never go to the theatre.

Q.—Then your convictions with regard to Jewish influence in the theatre would be based on what?

A.—On television.

Q.—And your knowledge of Jewish control of the Federal Reserve System?

A.—Telepathy.

Q.—And with regard to Jewish control of Secretary Mellon?

A.—On the improved cathode ray.

Q.—Does personal ratiocination in any form enter into your conclusions?

A.—Well, it's this way. I don't like the Federal Reserve and I don't like the international Jew, and putting one and one together I get what the boys on The Dearborn Independent think I ought to get.

Q.—Would you say, then, that your interpretation of the international Jew represents the combined efforts of your secretarial staff and the boys on The Independent?

A.—That's right. You see, it's the assembling system as we practice it at Detroit. Somebody puts the skeleton framework of an international Jew onto the endless belt. Another fellow with a wrench jumps forward and puts in something about Jewish finance. Another fellow has a hammer and taps in something about Jewish war-profiteering. Two other fellows with screw-drivers insert Jewish ultra-conservatives and Jewish revolutionaries, respectively. When everybody is through the completed international Jew drives off under his own power and into the pages of The Dearborn Independent. Any time you are in Detroit I should be happy to show you around the shop.

THE POINT OF IT ALL.

Q.—Thank you! Now what do you consider to be some of the responsibilities of great wealth?

A.—The only proper use of great wealth is to develop mass production by way of raising the American standard of living.

Q.—Do you regard the mass production of hate as one of the purposes to which wealth should be dedicated?

A.—The boys on The Independent could answer that better than I can.

Q.—Do you believe that the plane of American life is appreciably raised by fomenting racial and religious hatreds?

A.—Same answer.

Q.—Do you regard the Dec. 25 issue of The Dearborn Independent as an ideal Christmas message to the American people?

A.—Same answer.

Q.—One more point. You consider the international Jew to be our chief national peril?

A.—I certainly do.

Q.—Do you regard the international Jew as a more serious menace than General Motors?

A. (After a pause)—Well, that's an idea.

AS TO SHAW AND ERSKINE.

Mental Sandbaggers, They Are Called by One Who Wishes Them No Good.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I congratulate THE TIMES upon its issue of Dec. 13. You made of a "dead Monday" in journalism a living, lighted thing.

The Butler article on Church and State, in spite of the materially worded headline, was shockingly intelligent; the Jean Richepin obituary was far from sepulchral in what it suggested; and then to Rabbi Wise on Shaw and Erskine.

But why should Wise spare Shaw and accuse Erskine of moral heresy? These two intellectuals are in the same corrupting, carnal boat. Both in youth starved their devils, continued the Puritanic practice in manhood, and the result is a diabolic delight in getting these poisons out of their systems at the expense of the eternally infected public.

Shaw has not the slightest conception of the spiritual meaning of Joan of Arc. Not being able to conceive her—the Gallic soul—spiritually, he dragged her down, in cunning ways, to his intellectual sewerage. Thus with Erskine with two traditions for which I have a sacred and chivalric feeling, namely, Galahad and Helen of Troy. Both are historic, mythic and mystic. The porcine intellect but sees the fleshly, external side. Helen is the Hellenic soul—the name means white not the black of the Columbia professor—and Galahad is the spirit that fights for the soul. These are fine subjects for Shaw and Erskine to make money out of. But the intellect, separated from the spirit, is ever the Great Hog—grunting at the white bird above the sty—ever singing its glorious song, trying to lift the race out of the mud.

No, Rabbi Wise, both these men are mental sandbaggers—mud-smearers of the birds of Paradise. Both should be given a ride to the wilderness on a broomstick and the eternal silence of the fool-proof desert.

BEAUTIFYING PUBLIC SQUARES.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The architectural renaissance of, say, the last twenty years in the city is rapidly making New York the architectural glory of the world. Strange to say that coincident with the advance is the decrease in care of and interest in our public squares and parks.

In their present state they are unworthy of country towns and a disgrace to the fair name of our city. For the comparatively small amount necessary, the public squares could be made places of beauty.

If a beginning were made in Washington Square with, say, a railing worthy of the name, a beautiful fountain, newly laid out walks, with new trees and shrubs, and properly lighted in every part at night, an impulse in the direction of further beautification would be given to the whole city.

A board of trustees of standing comparable to, say, that of the Museum of Art, in part appointed by the Mayor, and cooperating with the Park Commissioner, could make a responsive appeal to the whole city and render quickly possible its restoration and preservation.

JOHN A. WADE.

New York, Dec. 16, 1926.

A NURSE'S POINT OF VIEW.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THE TIMES editorial "Professional Standards" mentioned the nurse among others classed as professionals. There is a great deal to be said for and against the nurse, but much more to be done for her if the standards of the nursing profession are to be maintained and raised.

The editorial referred to what has been accomplished in safeguarding the public against the quack doctor through the registration of physicians. Why not insure the public against the quack nurse?

Registration at Albany or credentials from a recognized training school do not protect the graduate nurse, much less the public, when doctors are allowed to employ those who have not graduated to take care of patients on whom they have performed major operations. This is also true of registries which send those not fully trained into homes to attend pneumonia or contagious disease patients.

Is there not one among us who would dare to be a Daniel and organize, or unionize if necessary, this great body of women who have studied hard to give the public the highest type of service?

SUPPORT FOR THE LEAGUE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I want to congratulate THE TIMES on the editorial "Not Good Enough for Us."

I hope THE TIMES will have frequent articles regarding this question. The League of Nations is the greatest and best thing for peace and justice that has ever been done in the entire history of the world, and any one believing in peace and justice—yes, and Christianity—must believe in and support it. It is fitting that this great enterprise was conceived and put into effect by the greatest man in the history of the world—namely, Woodrow Wilson.

Also keep up your good work for Smith and tolerance.

A SOFT GRAY ANGEL CAME.

I said, I am weary now,
Weary of all things living,
Of footsteps that come to my door,
Of voices that call me and call me.
I am weary of hands that beckon,
Of singing and laughter,
I am weary even of loving.

I said, I am weary now.
I will speak no more with my kind.
If a knock shall come at the door
I will never answer at all.
If they say, "Are you there?
Are you there?"
I will only be silent and wait.

Then I laid me down to rest;
And an angel came,
A soft gray angel,
More like a nun or a mother,
And she stood and signed me a cross
And gave me blessing.

Then footsteps came to my door,
And a quick hand knocked.
I cried, Come in! Come in!
I laughed and was gay.

And only the angel knew
I was weary, weary.
The soft gray angel,
More like a nun or a mother.

J. B. WEBER DEAD; WAR COLONEL AT 20

Raised and Led Negro Regiment for the Union—Former Buffalo Congressman.

OPPONENT OF CLEVELAND

Lost to Future President on Sheriff, Then Succeeded Him—Had Immigration Post Here.

BUFFALO, Dec. 18 (AP).—Colonel John B. Weber, former Representative in Congress from the Thirty-third New York District and a familiar figure in Erie County political circles, died at his home in West Seneca today.

He was born here in 1842. His first important political contest was for the office of Sheriff in 1870, when he was defeated at the polls by Grover Cleveland.

Responding to Lincoln's call for volunteers, Colonel Weber enlisted at 19 in the famous regiment known as Ellsworth's Avengers. After the siege of Yorktown he was made a Second Lieutenant. He won special mention for his conduct in the "Seven Days' Fight" before Richmond.

After rising to the rank of Assistant Adjutant General of Chapin's Brigade he served with it at Port Hudson and then was offered the choice of a colonelcy of a Massachusetts regiment or the opportunity to raise a colored regiment. He chose the latter and in 1863, when still under 21, he became Colonel of the Eighty-ninth United States Colored Infantry, which he led throughout the remainder of the war.

After the conflict Colonel Weber returned to Buffalo and went into business. He served as assistant postmaster of Buffalo from 1870-1873. In 1870 Grover Cleveland had defeated him for Sheriff of Erie County by 300 votes, but three years later Weber was elected to the office in succession to Cleveland. After representing the Thirty-third District in Congress from 1885 to 1889 he served for three years as Commissioner of Immigration for the Port of New York, being appointed by President Harrison. The Secretary of the Treasury made Colonel Weber Chairman of a commission which visited Europe at that time to study the causes of immigration, and in the course of his travels in this work he spent several months, chiefly in Russia, investigating persecutions of the Jews.

Colonel Weber was Commissioner General of the Pan-American Exposition held at Buffalo in 1901. He wrote many articles on immigration, pauperism and crime. His first wife, Elizabeth J. Farling of Buffalo, died in 1900, and in 1912 he married Alice J. Roberts of Paris.

JOSEPH JAY MANNING, STOCK OPERATOR, DIES

One of the Largest Independent Traders on New York Exchange Stricken Suddenly at 63.

Joseph Jay Manning, for many years one of the largest independent traders on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange, of which he had been a member since 1893, died suddenly yesterday of arterial sclerosis at his residence, 15 West Fifty-third Street, at the age of 63. He is survived by his wife, formerly Estelle Antoinette Gilbert. The funeral services will be held privately.

Mr. Manning's name, which was usually "Joe" Manning, in Wall Street, was frequently mentioned with that of Jesse Livermore, both men ranking among the keenest and largest traders in the stock market. Mr. Manning was not a member of any firm. He had an office of his own at 66 Broadway. He had been described as a genius at the mysterious art or science of "tape reading," and was also said to possess the ability to act instantly on his judgment of the meaning of the tape's figures. He took quick profits as a rule, liked to be in and out of the market. At times he would assert he found Wall Street dull and would start on a vacation, but he usually hurried back to the Exchange, occasionally not even staying away long enough to reach the place picked for his holiday. Like all big operators he gave rise to many stories of his winning and losing fortunes with apparent indifference.

Among Mr. Manning's clubs were the Racquet and Tennis, Automobile of America, National Golf, Piping Rock, Links and Richmond County Country Club.

Service in Memory of Akeley.

A memorial service arranged by friends of Carl Ethan Akeley, who died in the Belgian Congo on Nov. 17 and has been buried there, will be held in the auditorium of the American Museum of Natural History, Seventy-seventh Street and Central Park West, at 4:30 P. M. next Tuesday. Henry Fairfield Osborn, President of the Museum, will preside and there will be addresses representing the different phases of Mr. Akeley's life. Kermit Roosevelt will speak for the Boone and Crocket Club and the Explorers' Club on "Akeley, the Naturalist and Explorer;" Baron de Cartier de Marchienne, Belgian Ambassador, on "Akeley, the Conservationist;" James Earle Fraser, President of the National Sculpture Society, on "Akeley, the Artist and Sculptor;" F. Trubee Davison, Assistant Secretary of War, on "Akeley, the Inventor," and George H. Sherwood, Acting Director of the museum, on "Akeley, the Man."

Augustus P. Avery.

Augustus P. Avery, for fifty years in the insurance business in Brooklyn as an agent and broker, died Friday of heart disease at his home, 527 Throop Avenue, Brooklyn, aged 77. He was one of the oldest members of Plymouth Church, having joined it in 1872. He was for many years one of its deacons. He is survived by his widow and daughter. The funeral services will be held at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn.

Granville A. Richardson.

Granville A. Richardson, Chairman of the board of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, the Hillside Coal and Iron Company and other coal concerns, died Tuesday at his residence, 181 Upper Mountain Avenue, Montclair, N. J. He was formerly a Vice President of the Erie Railroad. The body was taken to Columbus Grove, Ohio, for burial.

Other Obituary Notices are printed on Page 26, Section 1.

FREDERICK W. MOWBRAY.

Prominent Lumber Merchant of Cincinnati Dies in Arizona.

Special to The New York Times.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, Dec. 18.—Frederick W. Mowbray, 55, a member of the firm of Mowbray & Robinson, Cincinnati lumber dealers, and one of the best known men in the lumber industry in the United States, died at his Winter home in Phoenix, Ariz., early today, according to a telegram received in Cincinnati.

During the war he was made a member of the Emergency Lumber Board, which handled huge lumber contracts for the Government.

Mowbray came to Cincinnati many years ago from Peru, Ind., his birthplace. He was with C. Crane & Co. for several years. In 1901 he assisted in forming the firm of Mowbray & Robinson and his entire business attention has been devoted to this company.

When Mowbray went to Phoenix this Fall he was accompanied by his wife and a daughter, Ruth, and they were at his bedside when he died. Besides his daughter, Mrs. I. T. Omara, who lives in Cincinnati, he is also survived by a daughter, Mary Louise, who is attending school in Chicago.

Mowbray was a member of the Cincinnati Club, the Hyde Park Country Club, the Queen City Lodge of Masons, Hanselmann Commandery, Syrian Temple and the Cincinnati Lodge of Elks.

HYMAN—Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, the Congregation Shearith Israel in the City of New York, Central Park West and 70th St.

At a meeting of the Board of Trustees of this congregation held Tebet 12, 5687, Dec. 16, 1926, evening, the following having been presented and read, was on motion unanimously adopted, viz.:

Whereas this board has learned with the deepest grief of the demise of Samuel L. Hyman, President of this congregation; and

Whereas Mr. Hyman for over a quarter of a century has served this congregation successively as Trustee, Vice President and President; now therefore be it

Resolved, That in the demise of our friend and colleague the entire congregation has sustained not only a personal loss but witnesses the mortal passing of one who, throughout his entire life, was a living example of fidelity to the principles of Orthodox Judaism and devotion to the strict integrity of the ancient traditions of our Holy Synagogue, and whose unselfish service in the positions of honor and trust which he so faithfully occupied will constitute his imperishable monument among us.

Resolved, That we extend to the bereaved widow and family of our departed associate our most respectful prayers for the comfort of Heaven in the great affliction which they have been called upon to endure, and we truly share with them this great sorrow;

Resolved, That this board attend the funeral of our late beloved President in a body, that the banca in the synagogue be turned and appropriately draped during the thirty days of mourning, that his name be entered upon the Roll of Perpetual Prayers for the Departed, and that as a further mark of respect to his memory this board does now adjourn.
N. TAYLOR PHILLIPS, Acting President.
I. PHILLIPS COHEN, Clerk.

HYMAN—Samuel L. At a special meeting of the Board of Directors of Lebanon Hospital announcement was made of the death of Mr. Samuel L. Hyman, Treasurer and a director of the institution since 1903, whereupon it was resolved to express the sentiments of the members of the board in the following minute:

It is with deepest sorrow that we have learned of the death of Samuel L. Hyman, who has most faithfully served the hospital for upward of twenty-three years.

During this period he has given freely of his time and his means to advance the interest of the hospital in every possible way; he worked unselfishly and effectively in developing the resources of the institution, was always ready to lend financial aid when this was required, and his loss will be keenly felt by us all.

For years he had devoted himself not only to the finances of the hospital, as its Treasurer, but also to the many other departments of the institution. He was an active member of the House, Dispensary, Training School and Conference Committees, and looked after every detail in connection with the work of the respective committees.

Through long years of association he had endeared himself to all, and his demise fills us with a deep sense of personal loss. The community has lost a splendid citizen, who maintained a broad interest in all work involving the relief of the poor and suffering.

To the family we extend our sincere sympathy in this great and irreparable loss.

Resolved, That the Board of Directors attend the funeral in a body on Sunday, Dec. 19, 1926, at 10 A. M., from his late residence, 233 West 83d St., and that an engrossed copy of this resolution be sent to the family of the deceased.

Deaths

WARD—At a special meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Excelsior Savings Bank held Dec. 17, 1926, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas the trustees of this bank have learned with profound sorrow of the death of their esteemed trustee and late President, Mr. Joseph H. Ward, who was elected President on May 12, 1924, and owing to continued ill-health resigned as President on Oct. 31, 1926, and who during his term of office has, in his devotion to the interests of the bank, his faithful and conscientious discharge of his duties, his sterling integrity and genial personality, endeared himself to all the members of this board; be it, therefore,

Resolved, That by the death of Mr. Joseph H. Ward the trustees of this bank lose not only a beloved business associate, whose conservative judgment, especially in its investments in real estate loans, will be greatly missed, but also a personal friend. It is further

Resolved, That we deeply deplore his death, and we extend to his bereaved wife and family our heartfelt sympathy. It is further resolved that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this bank and that a copy, suitably engrossed, be presented to his family.
REGINALD ROOME, President.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Advance in Stocks Slows Down Despite Activity—Franc Higher, Bank Reserve Deficit.

The pace of excited speculation slowed down materially on the Stock Exchange yesterday, apparently because Thursday's speculative sellers had covered their commitments in Friday's tumultuous market and because speculative buyers of the week's earlier days were more willing to sell. It will be recalled that the Steel Corporation's dividend announcement came in immediate sequence to declines of 2 to 8 points on Thursday's stock market. In so far as those declines were a result purely of "bear sales," no time was lost in closing out the position. But while the slackening of pace in yesterday's market was commonly ascribed to the completion of that retreat, it did not throw much light on the market's actual position.

It is true that halt or reaction on the Stock Exchange has this year frequently accompanied actual announcements of a favorable character. But that occurred mostly when the news merely fulfilled repeated and definite prediction, and that was obviously not the case with Thursday's Steel Corporation announcement. Furthermore, although the movement of prices on yesterday's stock market was narrower than the day before, and although there were fairly numerous net declines, nevertheless the business actually done was the largest of any Saturday in thirteen months.

Possibly the money market position acted as a restraint on exuberant professional enthusiasm, for the approaching year-end requirements of credit will hardly be met as comfortably as they were at the end of last December. The Associated Banks yesterday reported a deficit of $5,036,000 in reserves, the second of the month and the tenth of the year. December deficits are not unusual, but comparison will naturally be made with this week in 1925, when the same banks reported a $38,728,000 surplus and when there was no deficit whatever in the month or until Jan. 2.

The day's stock market was distinctly irregular. Advances ranging from 2 to 3 points were numerous among the active industrial shares, but most of those stocks lost part of the rise before the end, and United States Steel itself was one of the stocks to show a net decline in its closing price. The leading railway shares were for the most part distinctly strong, but in the miscellaneous and less active stocks, where the day's changes were only fractional, losses were as numerous as gains. The investment bond market ended the week with fully sustained strength; the "averages" went to a new high-record price since April, 1913.

Evidently the stock market, the money market and the bond market will all be objects of much interest this week. Those three markets almost always affect one another in the last weeks of December. Even in the closing fortnight of 1924, when trade revival and investment buying had been of the most impressive character, the rise on the Stock Exchange halted in that period. There have been occasions when a wild speculation for the rise was conducted unremittingly up to New Year's eve; but that sort of thing occurred mostly before the war and in defiance of a tightening money market—notably in the long-remembered Winter of 1905, when the promoters of the speculation borrowed heavily from London and yet had to pay 125 per cent. for call money in Wall Street on Dec. 28, with a gravely disordered credit market in the next four months.

The principal foreign exchanges ended at the week's best prices. The franc crossed the 4-cent level on the rise again, and closed at exactly that figure. Sterling's sustained strength added something of perplexity to London's export of $6,000,000 to $7,000,000 gold last week, of which nearly $5,000,000 was taken from the Bank of England. Although the destination of these shipments was not stated, they could hardly have gone in bulk to any other market than Berlin. If that is so, it will direct a new interest to the Reichsbank's operations in the gold market; based, as they unquestionably have been, on the huge mass of public and private German securities sold abroad during 1926. When one reflects on the fact that Germany was a hopelessly insolvent State exactly three years ago, it will have to be admitted that the whirligig of time brings strange transformations, even in finance.

MANY STOCKS RISE IN BULLISH MARKET

Turnover Totals 1,227,992 Shares in Two Hours—Carriers in Lead.

NEW RECORD FOR ATCHISON

New York Central Up 4¼ Points—Trading Responds to List of Favorable Actions.

Wall Street's Christmas market forged ahead yesterday in the two-hour trading period on the Stock Exchange. Gains in many stocks ranged from fractions to as much as 5⅝ points, and throughout the entire list there were evidences of bullish jubilation.

The trading on the Stock Exchange was most unusual for a Saturday. During the big two-hour day a total of 1,227,992 shares of stock were turned over. This was the largest total on a Saturday since Nov. 14, 1925, and the sum came within 400,000 shares of the high record for a Saturday, which was 1,632,550 shares, established on Oct. 17, 1925.

The enthusiasm which has been generated in the stock market by a succession of favorable developments was quite apparent yesterday. These developments included a proposed 40 per cent. stock dividend on the common shares of the United States Steel Corporation, a higher dividend by Crucible Steel, and the election of a "Van Sweringen executive" to the Presidency of the Erie Railroad, all of which were more or less unexpected in the financial district.

These developments had the effect of bringing big and broad markets. They also had the effect of stimulating an outburst of trading, which resulted in three 2,000,000-share days on the Exchange in the week. Despite the large increase in trading, it was admitted generally in Wall Street that the transactions of the week had been, to a large extent, professional. In some quarters it was estimated that these operations accounted for about 90 per cent. of the total transactions.

Yesterday's market was featured by a sharp advance in the railroad shares. New York Central gained 4¼ points, a remarkable advance for this stock. There were advances in such issues as Atchison, which gained 5⅝ points and sold at a new high record for all time; Baldwin Locomotive, American Can, General Motors, Mack Trucks, Postum Cereal, United States Rubber and Warner Brothers A. Short covering was a big factor in the day's business

ITALIAN GOVERNMENT'S MOVE IN MONEY MARKET

Acquisition of Foreign Exchange for the Treasury and Reduction of Floating Debt.

London financial bulletins call attention to the fact that "the Italian Treasury has been authorized to take over up to $100,000,000 of foreign currencies which might result from the proceeds of private foreign loans, and to give a foreign currencies guarantee in respect of interest and redemption at rates at which the currencies were acquired. The guarantee should not be regarded as an external Government guarantee in respect of private foreign loans, but applies only internally in the sense that when specified private undertakings contract foreign loans for development or other purposes, they may transfer the foreign capital so obtained to the Treasury up to a total amount of $100,000,000, and the latter undertakes to provide the foreign currencies required for interest and redemption at the same rate of exchange at which it acquired the foreign capital so transferred.

"It is officially announced that during the first week since the subscription to the Littorio Loan has been opened, over 1,000 million lire of fresh money was subscribed, exclusive of the conversion of Treasury bills and bonds into bonds of the new loan. As the subscription will remain open for eight weeks in Italy, there is no doubt that the object of the Government of raising sufficient fresh money to assure an easy marketing of the new loan and to pay off a further amount of the remaining floating debt after the conversion will be fully attained."

PARIS STOCK MARKET.

State Bonds Advance, Sterling and Dollar Slightly Lower.

PARIS, Dec. 18.—Prices were quiet on the Bourse today. Three per cent. rentes 1 franc 55 centimes higher at 51 francs 50 centimes; 5 per cent. war loan 80 centimes higher at 56 francs 90 centimes.

Exchange on London 15 centimes lower at 121 francs 5 centimes. The American dollar was quoted at 24 francs 94 centimes, against 24 francs 97½ centimes yesterday.

Chapman & Co.'s Christmas Party.

The Christmas get-together of the eastern organization of P. W. Chapman & Co., Inc., was held yesterday afternoon at The Planters. It was sponsored by P. W. Chapman, President; B. L. Johnson, E. S. Larsen and R. E. Swart, Vice Presidents; A. D. Nelmes, Treasurer, and P. B. Preston, Secretary. Among the guests were Theodore S. Chapman, Emmet Corrigan, T. W. D. Duke, Norman Graham, C. W. Hansen, O. L. Meyer, R. J. Newsom, W. Park, Howard Peterson, William Schultheis, C. W. Simpkins, John Smith, G. R. Snider, Charles Sorg, J. C. Walsh and O. S. Wilson.

PARADOX IN FRENCH CURRENCY SITUATION

Floating Debt Increased by Return of Confidence—France's Return to Parity Discussed.

Discussing the opinions of French financiers and statesmen regarding the rate at which the franc may be stabilized, The London Economist quotes M. Loucheur as insisting "that in theory there is nothing to prevent complete revalorization of the franc, if the State pays off, in eight to ten years, the debt of 35,000 or 36,000 millions which it owes to the bank. Every year, in that case, the value of the franc would increase, and eventually the currency would be brought back to its pre-war value.

"Such a policy, however, M. Loucheur insists, would lead to a reduction in the volume of business, instability, and the risk of unemployment, and would result in an annual budget of from 22,000 to 23,000 millions, over four-fifths of which would be required for the service of the public debt. On balance, M. Loucheur expresses himself as strongly in favor of stabilization.

"The situation as it stands is paradoxical in the extreme, and in no respect more so than in regard to the floating debt. Some 3,000 million francs of bonds have been consolidated, but simultaneously, thanks to the return of confidence, a very substantial amount of new bonds have been issued, while the Treasury has accumulated a large amount in deposits withdrawable at a moment's notice. On balance, it is more than probable that the total of the floating debt has not been appreciably diminished."

FINDS GERMAN CREDIT IMPROVING HERE

Head of Foreign Trade Securities Hails Trend Toward Closer Relations With Reich.

Improvement in the financial relations between German industries and the United States, with increased recognition of industrial progress in Germany, and the desire of Americans to invest in German industries have been among the outstanding features of the past year, according to Paul Klopstock, President of the Foreign Trade Securities Company, Ltd.

"The confidence of America in Germany's rehabilitation is best evidenced by the absorption and subsequent market appreciation of German securities offered in the American market, which reflects the improvement of Germany's credit as well as the political and economic recovery of the nation," Mr. Klopstock declared.

"The increase in Europe's purchasing power and that of other world markets, together with the improving conditions in Russia, should materially strengthen Germany's foreign trade, which, together with the efficiency and single purposeness of its political, banking and industrial world, can be considered as an insurance policy safeguarding the ability of Germany to meet its obligations and to work out any remaining political or economic problems.

"The extension of vast credits to Germany must be accepted as a demonstration of America's friendship and confidence in the country, and the continuation of further support may be confidently relied upon."

TRUST CO. PLANS BRANCHES

American Exchange Irving Concern Gets State Approval for Seven.

The State Department of Banking at Albany has approved an application of the American Exchange Irving Trust Company to open branch offices at Forty-second Street and Park Avenue, Broadway and Grand Street, Twenty-eighth Street and Madison Avenue, Forty-ninth Street and Seventh Avenue, Fifty-ninth Street and Park Avenue, Hudson Street at North Moore Street and 128 Broadway.

The General Motors Acceptance Corporation has been authorized to open branches in Sydney, Perth, Brisbane and Adelaide, all Australia, and Jerusalem, Palestine. The authorization certificate has been issued for the Central Mercantile Bank and Trust Company, with a capital of $2,500,000. The Steamship Clerks' Savings and Loan Association has been permitted to change its place of business from Pier 13 to Pier 14 East River.

PLAN VICTOR FINANCING.

Bankers Are Arranging Details for the New Corporation.

Details of the financing to be arranged in connection with the recent sale of the Victor Talking Machine Company probably will be announced some time this week by Speyer & Co. and J. & W. Seligman & Co., the bankers who purchased the company in a transaction that may call for the transfer of $40,000,000 cash. The bankers declared yesterday that the financial set-up of the new corporation which is to be formed had not yet been worked out.

A dispatch from Philadelphia which purported to give the basis on which an exchange of securities would be effected was declared to be incorrect.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

News, Comment and Incident, On the Stock Exchange and In the Financial Markets.

While the spectacular features that characterized Friday's stock market were not evident yesterday, the advance on the New York Stock Exchange was quite as vigorous in many departments of the list. The railway shares were the most active. United States Steel common, although still the centre of interest, did not attract the attention which it did on the day before. It was again noteworthy that the stocks of companies which have large surpluses that may be capitalized were in urgent demand.

Large-Scale Saturday Trading.

Still under the influence of the United States Steel "melon" proposal, the stock market was more active yesterday than it has been on any Saturday since Nov. 14, 1925. The sales aggregated 1,227,992 shares yesterday, as compared with 1,628,200 on the former date. The biggest Saturday trading on record was on Oct. 17, 1925, when 1,632,550 shares changed hands.

Other Wall Street "Surprises."

The complete surprise with which the 40 per cent. Steel dividend caught Wall Street Thursday afternoon, and the stock market's subsequent action, started reminiscence last week as to other occasions when an important announcement caught the Stock Echange completely off its guard. Two celebrated cases recalled were the advance in the Reserve Bank's rate on Nov. 3, 1919, and the Union Pacific dividend of Aug. 17, 1906. The 1919 market had come to believe that no attempt would be made to raise the bank rate; a furious speculation for the rise was in progress. The advance was announced after business on a Monday afternoon. Tuesday was election day. On Wednesday Wall Street managed to bid up stocks at the start. But call money promptly rose to 20 per cent. and in a day or two the market was breaking at a rate that carried some shares down 50 to 100 points in two weeks. In 1906, Union Pacific was paying 6 per cent. annually. An increase to 7 or 7½ had been predicted, but on Friday afternoon, Aug. 17, the board raised the rate to 10 per cent. On the Saturday market there was a confused rise, and after the Sunday holiday enormous speculative buying raised the Monday transactions to 2,716,000 shares. Union Pacific rose 38 points before the month was over; other railways 10 to 20.

The Best "Market Advice."

Recalling the days when a hundred or so office boys used to gather each morning on the doorstep of a brokerage office which issued daily an unusually keen and informative market letter, conversation in one of the banking houses of the Street drifted the other day into speculation as to the identity of the best market-letter writer at present. One of the partners in the banking house suggested that the best market-letter writer this year has been Secretary Mellon, and that the "White House spokesman" would probably be named second on the list.

"Short Covering" a Factor.

It is quite within the range of possibility, as Wall Street figures it, that the short interest which has been so evident in the market in the past three or four weeks has been greatly reduced by the week's activities in stocks. Nearly all Stock Exchange brokers are willing to testify that short accounts on their books have been very materially reduced during the past week. It is to some extent this sort of buying which has produced 2,000,000-share days. Some brokers admitted on Saturday that it probably is just as true now as it was a week ago that "the public is not in the market," and, despite the news developments of the week, many people in the financial district expressed doubt as to whether the speculative public has been visibly stirred up. So far as regards last week's markets, it was asserted that the fright of the "short interest" had most to do with the advance in quotations. A panic-stricken "short," it was added, is always a more aggressive bidder for stocks than the ordinary outside buyer.

Franc Holds at 4 Cents.

The underlying strength in the French franc at the 4-cent level, and of the Italian lira about ⅛-cent higher, impressed foreign exchange dealers in the closing days of last week. The action of the franc was taken to indicate that this unit is not to be permitted to sink below its present level, and that it probably will be allowed to work somewhat higher before stabilization is definitely undertaken. The absence of reaction after the prolonged advance, and the failure of the market to work lower following the reduction of the Bank of France's discount rate, indicated to many that official favor was behind the market, in addition to the speculative buying in many parts of the world. The lira has been frankly controlled by official Italian agencies in furtherance of the deflation program. In neither country are the unfavorable trade developments believed by New York foreign exchange dealers to be as great as some dispatches would indicate.

Forecasting the Security Market.

Investment dealers expect a continuation next year of the remarkable absorptive power which has made 1926 notable in the sale of new securities. Cheap money is expected, as a general thing, once the year-end requirements are out of the way, and with the country's investment surplus increasing at a rapid pace nothing appears to bankers to be in sight to disturb conditions in the bond market. Several notable security flotations took place last week. An outstanding operation was the sale of $120,000,000 of debentures of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, which issue was entirely absorbed by preferred stockholders, leaving a large public demand unsatisfied. A $200,000,000 offering of Treasury certificates resulted in subscriptions totaling around a billion dollars, even though the interest rate was only 3¼ per cent. Other offerings, both foreign and domestic, have sold almost as rapidly.

The Oversubscribed Treasury Issue.

Bankers commenting last week on the unprecedentedly large subscription of $1,096,000,000 to the $200,000,000 offering of nine-months' certificates by the Treasury, emphasized the wact that use of these short-term loans as the Treasury, emphasized the fact not only by banks but by individuals, had increased greatly of recent years. Because of their near maturity these certificates vary little in price. It is possible to buy them and hold them only for a couple of weeks without hazard to the principal. Since it is difficult to get much more than 2 per cent. from banks or trust companies for a deposit subject to call, even the relatively low rate of 3¼ per cent., placed on the Treasury's offering of last Wednesday, insured a considerably larger return than could be obtained through interest payments on the deposit itself. It was pointed out by some bankers that the French market has carried to the furthest point this use of short-term Government loans and that the very wide circulation of the "defense bonds" was attributable to the same desire for brief investment of bank funds.

PROFIT SHARING BONDS

the Most Scientific, Equitable and Up-to-Date Bond Issued — A Profitable, Sound Investment — With Long Record of Safety.

1. The ordinary bond pays you a fixed return—nothing more.
2. No matter how prosperous the issuing company, your income is limited to 5%, 6%, 7%, etc.
3. A 5% return today is worth only about 3% based on the dollar's Pre-World War purchasing power.
4. Hence highest possible returns are more imperative today than ever.
5. Profit Sharing Bonds afford the investor a share in the earnings which his investment has helped to make possible. This in addition to his bond interest.
6. They pay large returns by sharing the profits which good management earns.
7. One Profit Sharing Bond issue originated and distributed by us has paid original purchasers a total of 124% of par in twelve years—and holders still have many years of interest and profit sharing ahead of them, with their principal still intact.
8. Five income payments every year—a unique feature. Interest paid quarterly by coupon; profit sharing paid annually by check.
9. Profit Sharing Bonds have long record of safety. We are now in our thirty-fourth year. No bond issue distributed by us has ever defaulted in principal or interest.
10. Available to the smallest investor in $100 denominations. Also in $500 and $1,000 pieces.

Get your 7% coupon rate and your just share of the profits too. Shorten your road to financial independence. Thousands of others are doing it. Write for our interesting Profit Sharing Booklet T-306. Fill out the coupon today.

JOHNS-MANVILLE PLANS STOCK SPLIT

Stockholders Will Meet Dec. 28 to Approve the Method of Reorganization.

TOTAL ASSETS TO BE SOLD

Readjustment of Capital Contemplated—Would Give Holders Three Shares of No-Par Common.

A special meeting of stockholders of Johns-Manville, Inc., has been called for Dec. 28 to approve a plan of reorganization which calls for a stock split-up. Under the plan the total assets of the present company, including the right to use its name and its franchises, will be sold to a new company to be known as the Johns-Manville Corporation. This plan contemplates the readjustment of the capital structure, with benefit to stockholders, of one of the few remaining industrial organizations of large size controlled by the family of the founders.

Holders of the present no-par capital stock of Johns-Manville, Inc., will receive for each share held three shares of no-par common and three-tenths of a share of 7 per cent. cumulative $100 par preferred stock of the new corporation. In connection with the plan the directors have proposed to issue 100,000 shares of 7 per cent. preferred stock and 750,000 shares of no-par common stock.

H. E. Manville, President of the company, in announcing the reorganization explained that no change in the management of the company was contemplated. "Notice was sent to stockholders of Johns-Manville, Inc., on Dec. 17," his announcement read, "that a meeting would be held to pass upon a plan of reorganization. When that plan is adopted any holder of ten shares of Johns-Manville, Inc., will receive in the stock of the new corporation which will take over its assets $300 par value of new preferred and three shares of no-par common stock.

"Fractional shares of preferred stock will not be issued, but warrants will be issued, which, when combined with other fractional warrants, will entitle the holder to three full shares of preferred stock. Arrangements have been made by which stockholders may sell fractional warrants at not less than $30 for three-tenths of a share.

"The new preferred stock will provide for cumulative dividends at the rate of 7 per cent. a year, payable quarterly, and the stock will be redeemable at $120 a share, plus accrued and unpaid dividends."

Mr. Manville will continue as President of the corporation.

SEAMAN'S BANK TO MOVE.

Will Enter New Home at 74 Wall Street Tomorrow Morning.

The Seaman's Bank for Savings, now in its ninety-eighth year, will move into its new home at 74 Wall Street tomorrow morning. The bank has conducted business on this site since 1871, and recently decided to erect a new structure. More than 100,000 invitations have been sent out for the ceremonies, and a private inspection for depositors will be held on Thursday and Friday.

The new building, which will have a rental income of almost $300,000 a year, has a frontage of 89 feet on Wall Street and 129 feet on Pearl Street. Since its establishment on May 11, 1829, on the second floor of 149 Maiden Lane, where its business for that year totaled about $14,494, the bank has always been in the vicinity of its present site. In 1847 deposits passed the $1,000,000 mark, in 1873 they exceeded $10,000,000, and at present deposits are more than $80,000,000, with resources of more than $100,000,00.

UNDERWOOD GENIAL UNDER GIBES AT ERIE

Joke Telling an Art With Railroad Raconteur, Even at the Expense of His Own Road.

STATISTICS BORE HIM

Would Have Had to Be a Brakeman 900 Years to Know All Those Who Ask Favors From Him.

Faced with the task of running a railroad bound to become the butt of Wall Street jokes because of its poverty-stricken condition, Frederick Underwood, President of the Erie, outdid his wittiest competitors with "wise cracks" about the Erie and other railroads.

Joke-telling to him is an art. No matter how much business is on the docket, he finds time to tell a few stories to his friends. Those who have dropped in to see him at the Erie offices at 50 Church Street never went away unrewarded. They always carried away a good story and generally a new one.

When he relinquishes his duties as the Erie's President after the first of the year, he will retain the same office he occupied during Federal control, and his friends plan to drop in just as they always have to hear Fred Underwood's comments on the passing show.

Nearly fifty-four years in railroading have brought him in contact with many thousand men. He once remarked that he got hundreds of requests every year for favors from people who said their fathers or grandfathers once worked beside him as a brakeman. "To have known all these people and work for all the railroads mentioned," he said, "I would have had to be a brakeman for about 900 years on 50 railroads."

His age has been one of the mysteries of Wall Street. He always refused to reveal it, and to this day it is not known outside his family whether he is 71, 72 or 73. He refused emphatically to have it listed in Who's Who.

Figures never interested him—in fact, nothing bored him more than a statistical recital. The story is told of a visit by Mr. Underwood to the office of Leonor F. Loree, President of the Delaware & Hudson, in the course of which Mr. Loree read off a long list of statistics about ton-miles, train-miles and locomotive hours. Mr. Underwood listened patiently. At the end he pointed up at the eight pictures of the Presidents of the Delaware & Hudson that hang in Mr. Loree's office.

"That's all very true," he said, "but it's also true that 12½ per cent. of the Presidents of the Delaware & Hudson committed suicide."

The reference was to one of the eight who had taken his own life.

Mr. Underwood and William T. Truesdale, then President, and now Chairman of the Lackawanna, were walking down Broadway some years ago when the Lackawanna was featuring the "Phoebe Snow" advertising campaign. Mr. Truesdale excused himself for a moment to speak with a woman of very dark complexion.

"Who was that negress you were speaking to?" Underwood asked when the Lackawanna chief returned.

"She was not a negress," said Truesdale; "that was Phoebe Snow and she has just come back from Buffalo on the Erie."

Mr. Underwood often told this story at the expense of his own railroad.

Georgia Power Merger Approved.

Other properties involved in the merger are the East Georgia Power Company, Athens Railway and Electric Company and Rome Railway and Light Company.

Increase in Debits to Individual Accounts Shown by Report of Federal Board

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18.—Bank debits: Debits to individual accounts, as reported to the Federal Reserve Board by banks in leading cities for the week ended Dec. 15, 1926, aggregated $13,697,000,000 or 11.7 per cent. above the total of $12,267,000,000 reported for the preceding week.

Total debits for the week under review are $138,000,000 or 1 per cent. below those for the week ending Dec. 16, 1925. New York City reported an increase of $318,000,000 and Cleveland $25,000,000, while declines were reported as follows: Philadelphia, $89,000,000; San Francisco, $86,000,000; Chicago, $70,000,000; Detroit, $31,000,000; St. Louis and Minneapolis, $36,000,000 each, and Pittsburgh, $22,000,000. Aggregate debits for 141 centres for which figures have been published weekly since January, 1919, amounted to about $12,913,000,000 compared with $11,491,949,000 for the preceding week and $13,048,339,000 for the week ended Dec. 16, 1925.

Owing to the fact that Christmas falls on Saturday the Board's statement for the week ending Dec. 22 will be issued Monday, Dec. 27.

DIVIDENDS ADVANCE UNLISTED STOCKS

Over-the-Counter Market Acts in Response to Voting of Many Extras.

INDUSTRIALS ARE AFFECTED

Bank Shares Also Under the Same Influence—Activity in Closing Session of Week.

Extra dividend declarations in the past week were the outstanding feature of the securities markets, and profit possibilities in the over-the-counter market were greatly emphasized by the substantial amounts declared on unlisted stocks.

A striking reflection of the investment demand was the sharp advance in Johns-Manville, which more than made up the $18 special dividend taken off the stock at the start of the week. National Fuel Gas responded to declaration of a $2 extra with a 15-point gain and White Rock advanced about 25 points on announcement of $1.25 extra and $2.50 additional extra on the second preferred.

Other stocks which became top-liners in this market through dividend actions were National Licorice, Northern Securities, Pittsburgh & Lake Erie, Atlas Portland Cement, American Cigar, American Meter and MacAndrews & Forbes.

An unprecedented generosity on the part of bank directors toward both stockholders and employes resulted in substantial gains in the shares of such institutions. Several insurance issues also scored good gains on the week.

Sugar and chain stores marked advances on the week of from 3 to 5 points.

Yesterday's short session noted further constructive developments, the activity and strength being confined mainly to the industrials, public utilities and bank shares.

K. C. SOUTHERN NET DROPS.

November Balance After Taxes and Expenses Was $412,127.

The November gross and net of the Kansas City Southern Railway, reported yesterday, show slight decreases under the same month of last year.

Total revenues were $1,750,409, compared with $1,808,473 in November, 1925. The balance after expenses and taxes was $412,127, compared with $461,660. Eleven months' gross was $20,175,183 and net $5,494,688, compared respectively with $19,379,620 and $4,775,140. The figures follow in tabular form:

made possible
through CONSOLIDATION in the LAUNDRY INDUSTRY

CONSOLIDATION—the key to success in Power & Light Companies, Chain Stores, Railroads and Telephone Companies, with all the attendant profits to stockholders—is now being applied to the Laundry Industry, the twelfth largest industry in the United States.

The Associated Laundries of America, Inc. has already effected a consolidation of twenty-two laundry companies located in New York State and Pennsylvania and serves a territory of approximately 2,000,000 people.

The company has been a success from its inception and has paid dividends regularly on its Class A stock. This success has been made possible by savings effected through consolidation. Administrative and physical costs have been reduced materially and in some instances delivery costs have been lowered as much as 50%. The company's success has created a situation offering an unusual opportunity for expansion which in turn necessitates the issuance of an additional limited amount of the company's shares. These securities are available in blocks of three shares of Class A Participating Stock and one share of Class B Common Stock, the former carrying cumulative dividends of $1.00 per share payable quarterly. The blocks are priced at $52, returning a minimum investment yield of approximately 6% without giving consideration to increasing dividend returns or appreciation in the value of the stocks, as additional earnings due to savings effected by consolidation shall accrue.

A complete study of the laundry industry and the effects of consolidation as applied to the Associated Laundries of America, Inc. has been prepared in a booklet which is now ready for free distribution.

Send for it now. The coupon will bring it to you immediately and put you in a position to invest your January funds to advantage. Clip the coupon now or telephone direct to Murray Hill 9227. This is an unusual investment opportunity which justifies immediate action.

The Company has agreed to make application to list its shares on the New York Curb Market.

NATIONAL CITY BANK LOSES COURT FIGHT

Justice Proskauer Orders Payment of $112,832 Claim of Russian Estate.

TANGLED BY SOVIET BANK

Institution in Transaction Seized by Government After Money Had Been Deposited There.

A wartime transaction between New York and Russian banks, tangled by the conditions of the times and knotted further by the sovietization of the Russian bank, has been unraveled by Supreme Court Justice Proskauer in a decision just handed down, it was made known yesterday. By the ruling the National City Bank of New York must pay $112,832 to the estate of M. Sergey Friede, and also deliver to the Friede executors 250,000 imperial Russian bonds, due 1926; 4,700,000 Russian rubles, due 1926, and a $5,500 Iowa Short Line Railroad bond. The money judgment consists of $33,790 interest added to a verdict of $79,041 directed by Justice Proskauer.

The unusual circumstances outlined by the court were that in November, 1917, Cahn Brothers of Petrograd cabled the defendant bank to collect from F. Blumenthal & Co. a sum due them, and credit the Azoff Don Bank "our account." The Blumenthal company on Dec. 26 of that year remitted to the National City Bank $83,716 "for account of the Banque de l'Azoff Don, Petrograd." The payment was credited on the National City books to the Russian bank, but before the credit entry had been made the Azoff Don Bank's account with the New York bank had been overdrawn, so that the entry gave it a net credit of only $43,000.

One day after the money was deposited here the Soviet Government seized the Azoff Don Bank and amalgamated it with the State bank. The Cahns wired the New York bank on Feb. 22, 1918, to cancel the credit and return the money to the Blumenthal firm. The National City Bank cabled the Azoff Don Bank for authority to make the transfer. A member of the Cahn firm then called at the office of the Russian bank and had a cablegram sent by the manager of the foreign department, with the approval of the Soviet Commissioner, saying that they considered the credit canceled.

Justice Proskauer says he finds no proof of authority in the record for the sending of this cable, but in any event, the National City Bank refused to cancel the credit as requested.

The account remained unchanged on the books of the National City Bank until Oct. 21, 1919, excepting for an increase to $71,156 by the addition of interest, when the late M. Sergey Friede served an attachment on the bank in a suit against the Azoff Don Bank for $727,000 and directed the bank to hold for him all sums due the Russian bank. Several months later H. & J. Cahn sued for the entire sum of $83,716 with interest. The plaintiff got judgment in 1921 and the sum was paid by the National City Bank without an appeal.

The Court points out that the Cahns are not parties to the present suit, and because of the indemnity agreement "the hardship of their position is urged." Justice Proskauer says that all that happened was the result of their instructions to put the money to the credit of the Azoff Don Bank, and the instructions were followed literally. The Court accordingly ruled that a debtor and creditor relation existed between the two banks.

The National City Bank made a counterclaim for securities deposited with the Azoff Don Bank and not returned. The Court says that no proof was made of any demand for the return, while the National City asserted that the demand is excused because the property of the bank was turned over to the Soviet Government. In reply Justice Proskauer declared that there is no evidence by which he could infer that the securities would not be returned if they were demanded.

The bank also argued that the Soviet Government took the securities by force, making it impossible for the Azoff Don Bank to respond to a demand, but Justice Proskauer says this is met by the Court of Appeals ruling in a previous suit against the National City by one Sokoloff, in which the Court said that "surrender to overwhelming force would excuse the loss or destruction" of property so held. For this reason the counterclaim falls.

INDUSTRIALS ACTIVE ON THE CURB MARKET

Johns-Manville Gains 5¾ Points —Most Trading Is in High-Priced Stocks.

Industrial stocks held the centre of attention on the Curb Market yesterday and it was notable that the most active trading and the wide fluctuations were in the high-priced stocks, securities selling above $150 per share. One of the features was Johns-Manville, which gained 5¾ points on announcement of new financing for the corporation. There was a great deal of activity, too, in Pennsylvania Water and Power, Shredded Wheat, United Biscuit new and Glen Alden Coal.

In some of the lower-priced issues there was a considerable amount of profit-taking at the end of the week, and some moderate recessions were to be noted here and there throughout the list.

The day's sales were extremely large despite the fact that the market as a whole did not advance materially. The new "when issued" shares of United States Steel once more were the most active industrial stock on the list, sales in this issue amounting to more than 18,000 shares. The stock lost ground fractionally. Arbitrage operations between the old stock on the "big board" and the new stock on the Curb were reported mainly responsible for the pressure against this issue.

Cuban Dominican Sugar's Deficit.

The Cuban Dominican Sugar Corporation and subsidiaries report for the year ended on Sept. 30, 1926, a net loss of $3,239,820, after interest, depreciation, &c., as compared with a net loss of $1,630,322 in the previous year. Total receipts were $20,033,478, against $30,696,679.

AMERICANS INVEST ONE BILLION ABROAD

Estimate Made of Capital Sent to South America and Europe in Year.

AVERAGE BOND PRICES RISE

Domestic Figure at 89.69 Highest in Thirteen Years—Foreign Governments at 104.90.

Approximately $1,000,000,000 of American capital was invested abroad in the year now drawing to a close, chiefly through the flotation of bond issues. While European loans continued in fairly large volume, there was a pronounced drift to South America as a channel of American investments. This was one of the features of the year's bond market, which has been notable in many regards.

The investment demand has expanded in an unprecedented manner, as reflected in an almost uninterrupted upward movement of prices and in oversubscriptions of a majority of the new offerings. At the close of last week THE NEW YORK TIMES's average of forty domestic bonds, at 89.69, stood at its highest level in more than thirteen years, having moved up 4.45 points since the closing period of last year. The average of ten foreign Government bonds, at 104.90, was only a little below its high point and represented a net gain of 1.65 points in the year.

The average of domestic bonds stood at its lowest of the year last January. It drifted in a rather irregular manner for months, but with the main trend upward. In the latter part of the year strength was consistent. With money relatively easy and in abundant supply, with new offerings mostly inadequate to meet the investment demand, and with the supply of Government securities steadily diminished by the Treasury's policy of reducing the public debt, investors were forced to bid prices up to fill their requirements.

Belgian Loan as Starter.

The market for foreign bonds in the last few months has been of a most vigorous nature. The movement was started with a heavy oversubscription of a $50,000,000 portion of an international loan to Belgium. These bonds quickly moved up more than 6 points, and this was reflected promptly in general buying of other foreign bonds. The improvement in the French situation was followed by broad buying, which sent many French issues to their highest prices in years. German and Italian bonds also have been in demand, and the market in Japanese bonds, as well as several South American issues, also furnished strong spots.

Germany continued to be a heavy borrower in this market, although her takings were smaller than in the previous year. Much of the German financing was for the steel industry of that country, with loans ranging from $10,000,000 to $30,000,000. Future German financing in this market, however, is expected to be much smaller as a result of the enforcement of new tax regulations which will make foreign borrowing more expensive to German industries. In addition to the steel interests, German electrical industries were large borrowers here. Italian public utility and other corporate enterprises also floated a number of fairly large issues here. In South America, Brazil, Peru and other Governments floated issues, and a larger number of provincial and municipal loans were made.

$1,250,000,000 for Utilities.

Public utilities continued to furnish the largest field for new financing in this country, with total bond issues of approximately $1,250,000,000. The railroads continued to be moderate borrowers, but floated several important issues in the last half of the year.

The market situation was illustrated recently when a $120,000,000 issue of Standard Oil of New Jersey debentures was oversubscribed by the company's own preferred stockholders, leaving none of the securities for public offering and forcing the price to an immediate premium. Other important offerings brought subscriptions far in excess of the issues.

It is estimated that a total of $6,750,000,000 of American capital went into new securities this year, including stocks and bonds, both foreign and domestic. Of this total about five-sixths represented new capital and the remainder refunding operations.

BEAR MARKET AHEAD?

In the past four years we have had the biggest bull market on record. In 1921 industrial stocks sold below 65 on the average. They are now about 160—two and one-half times as high!

Most investors make money in a bull market. But, unfortunately, the majority lose all of their profits, and more, in the broad bear market that inevitably follows.

SELL NOW?

Is distribution of stocks now just as evident as was the accumulation of 1921? Will it be followed by a broad bear market—not of one or two months—but of years? What about the months ahead?

The answers to these questions are of utmost importance to every investor. The plain, unvarnished facts of the present stock market situation, together with specific recommendations to take advantage of conditions ahead, are given in a NEW analysis, just presented to clients.

1926 BANNER YEAR FOR THE RAILROADS

Great Increase in Efficiency of Transportation System Prime Achievement.

RESULT OF EXPENDITURES

Huge Volume of Freight Traffic Over Many Weeks Another Outstanding Fact.

The year 1926 will go down in the history of American railroads, first, as the fruition of their efforts to increase the capacity of their transportation machine and, second, as the first year since pre-war days when they enjoyed an outstanding increase in freight traffic.

Gains of 1925 over 1924 were interesting but they in no way equaled the remarkable advances that 1926 has made over 1925. The ability of the carriers to handle the astounding increase in freight traffic offered them rested primarily in their expenditure of approximately $5,196,000,000 in the seven years from 1920 to 1926, inclusive, in improving their roadbeds, terminal facilities and equipment.

In improving their roadbeds the carriers in the course of the year laid more than 2,500,000 tons of new heavy rail. More than half of this rail weighed 100 pounds or more to the yard, compared with an average weight of ninety pounds for trunk lines in pre-war days. In addition, most of the rail was of the new thirty-nine-foot standard length which is being installed in place of the old thirty-three-foot rail in main-line track. Ultimately, through the laying of the new length rail, which has the approval of the American Railway Association, the carriers hope to save about 16 per cent. in the cost of track maintenance.

The expansion of terminal facilities is noticeable in projects for the construction of new stations and freight yards at Buffalo, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Newark and other centres.

Investment in Equipment.

For about every $4 invested in fixed property the carriers have put $1 into the purchase of new equipment. During the first nine months of this year they put into service 83,383 new freight cars and 1,664 new locomotives. The record traffic of the year, however, was handled with virtually no more cars and considerably fewer locomotives than were in service five years ago. At the peak of traffic movement carloadings averaged 1,189,148 cars for eight consecutive weeks. At the beginning of this movement the railroads had 137,377 surplus cars and at the end, 88,130 cars available for additional traffic if needed. During the entire movement they had approximately 4,000 surplus locomotives in good order and ready for service.

This achievement was made possible by an increase in efficiency which enabled them to get more tractive power per locomotive, and more capacity per freight car and to move their freight more miles per day. The performance was characterized by Secretary Hoover in his current annual report as constituting "probably the most outstanding industrial achievement since the war."

Despite much talk regarding consolidation in the year and numerous applications to the Interstate Commerce Commission for authorization of leases of railroad properties, little progress in this direction was made. Most of the commission's decisions were negative in character. The proposal of the Van Sweringen brothers of Cleveland to merge five important western properties was turned down, as was that of the Norfolk & Western to acquire the Virginia railway. The commission's examiners ruled adversely on two of L. F. Loree's proposals, one which asked permission to build a line across Pennsylvania and the second which requested authorization of the lease of the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh by the Delaware & Hudson. Probably the most notable acquisition in the year was the purchase of the little Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic by the Atlantic Coast Line.

Huge Amount Earned.

In aggregate amount railroad earnings for 1926 will probably exceed $1,200,000,000. In rate of return earned on investment, earnings will be about 5.25 per cent., or less than they were in 1916 and previous years.

The carriers' tax bill for the year probably will be around $420,000,000, compared with $340,000,000 in 1925 and about $320,000,000 in 1924. Cash dividends will approximate $355,000,000, as against $340,000,00 in 1925 and about $320,000,000 in 1924. During the first ten months of the year net operating income was approximately $100,000,000 more than in the corresponding period of 1925, taxes were $30,000,000 more and expenses $98,000,000 more.

The roads will enter 1927 in the best physical condition in their history. Freight cars in need of repair now average less than 7 per cent. of total railroad ownership, and locomotives less than 15 per cent. The speed and certainty of railroad movement was never so great. Six years ago the railroads set as their goal a movement of thirty miles a day for the average freight car, taking the entire car supply into consideration. In September, 1925, they reached an average of thirty-two and one-half miles, and the average daily movement for this year will be at least two miles more than the previous record.

SETS NEW BANKING RECORD.

Brooklyn Investment & Loan Corp. Pays 10% Dividend.

A new record in industrial banking has been made by the Modern Investment and Loan Corporation of Brooklyn, which opened for business only two years ago, and declared yesterday a 10 per cent. dividend on its capital stock.

The announcement of the dividend was made by Jacob Leichtman, President, whose career in itself is a matter of note. Mr. Leichtman is only 28, and came here from Poland at 13 alone and with no immediate funds nor prospects. He went to work at $6 a week as a clerk.

The Modern Investment and Loan Corporation was organized with a capital and surplus of only $150,000 and today its resources are more than $5,000,000. Two months ago it acquired the Merchants' Loan and Investment Corporation of the east side and opened a branch at 318 Grand Street.

Scranton Telegram Suspends.

SCRANTON, Pa., Dec. 18 (AP).—The Scranton Telegram, one of the oldest Sunday newspapers in the State, will not make its appearance tomorrow. For several years the newspaper has been owned by William T. Hughes, former President of the Typographical Union in this city. There has been no official announcement by The Telegram's management, but The Scranton Times carries an announcement of the decision to discontinue publication.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

Stability of Franc and Lira Only Feature—Narrow Price Changes in Others.

Except for the relative stability of the French franc around 4 cents, and the Italian lira at approximately 4.50 cents, trading in the foreign exchanges yesterday was a quiet and uneventful affair. Fluctuations were narrow, and the turnover comparatively small, judging by the volume of some of the earlier sessions of the week.

Sterling was firm and unchanged at $4.84 11/16, the Scandinavians were slightly irregular, the Copenhagen and Oslo units sagging, with the Swedish document steady. Swiss, Spanish, German and Holland documents were dull, but firm. Far Easterns yielded in sympathy with lower silver prices. In the South Americans, the Argentina and Brazilian rates were slightly lower.

EXTRA PAYMENTS ORDERED.

Southern Pipe Line Co. Continues Readjustment of Stock Values.

In furtherance of its program of reducing the par value of its stock from $100 to $50 the Southern Pipe Line Company ordered a $10 per share additional cash payment yesterday from its capital reduction account, payable on March 1 to holders of record on Feb. 10.

The company paid $40 a share on June 25 to holders of the $50 par value certificates as a capital distribution, and the $10 just declared will make a total payment of $50. The Treasurer of the company has been instructed to withhold all payments on old $100 par certificates not yet exchanged into the new $50 par stock.

The Scovill Manufacturing Company of Waterbury, Conn., declared a quarterly dividend of 60 cents on its new $25 par stock. The stock was changed from $100 to $25 par recently and distributed to holders in the ratio of five new for one old. On the $100 par shares the company had paid at the rate of $12 a share for the last two years.

The Farr Alpaca Company declared a regular quarterly dividend of $2 and an extra of $1. Total payments for this year will be $12, against $13 last year.

The General Fireproofing Company of Youngstown, Ohio, declared a 25 cent extra dividend on its common stock and the regular quarterly dividends on the preferred. The Albany & Susquehanna Railroad declared the usual extra of $2.

MEETINGS AND ELECTIONS

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK

NOTICE OF ANNUAL MEETING OF SHAREHOLDERS JANUARY 11, 1927.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that the Annual Meeting of the shareholders of The National City Bank of New York will be held at its Head Office, No. 55 Wall Street, Borough of Manhattan, City of New York, on Tuesday, January 11, 1927, at 12 o'clock noon, for the purpose of electing Directors, of taking action upon the proposition recommended by the Board of Directors of increasing the capital stock of the Association from $50,000,000, as at present authorized, to $75,000,000, and of amending Article Fourth of the Articles of Association so as to provide that the capital stock shall be $75,000,000, divided into 750,000 shares of the par value of $100 each; of prescribing, authorizing or approving the terms and conditions upon which subscriptions for the increased stock shall be received and upon which such stock shall be issued; and of transacting such other business as may come before the meeting.

The stock transfer books will be closed at the close of business on Friday, December 24, 1926, and will be reopened at 10 o'clock A. M. on Wednesday, January 12, 1927.

By order of the Board of Directors
N. C. LENFESTEY, Cashier
New York, December 11, 1926

PROPOSALS.

NOTICE TO BIDDERS—SEALED PROPOSALS for Construction and Sanitary Work, State Office Building, Albany, N. Y., will be received by Hon. Alfred E. Smith, Governor, Chairman of State Office Site and Building Commission, Executive Chamber, Capitol, Albany, N. Y., until 2 o'clock P. M. (Eastern Standard Time), Wednesday, January 12, 1927, when they will be publicly opened and read. Proposals shall be enclosed in an envelope furnished by the State Architect sealed and addressed, and shall be accompanied by a deposit as a guarantee that bidder will enter into the contract if awarded same. Deposit shall consist of a certified check drawn upon some legally incorporated bank in this State and made payable to the State of New York, or money equal to 5 per cent. of the amount of proposal. The Contractors to whom the awards are made will be required to furnish surety company bond in the sum of fifty per cent (50%) of the amount of the contract within thirty days after official notice of award of contract and in accordance with the terms of Specifications Nos. 4772 and 4773. The right is reserved to reject any or all bids. Drawings and specifications may be examined at the New York Office of the State Architect, 18th Floor, Flatiron Bldg., 949 Broadway, and at the Office of the State Architect, Capitol, Albany, N. Y. Drawings, specifications and blank forms of proposal may be obtained by persons or firms engaged in the line of work required at the discretion of the Architect from the Office of the State Architect, Capitol, Albany, N. Y., upon a deposit in the sum of $150.00 of money, or check made payable to the State of New York for each set of Construction drawings and specifications, and $100.00 for each set of Sanitary drawings and specifications, which deposit will be returned if the drawings and specifications are received in good condition by the State Architect. Sullivan W. Jones, Capitol, Albany, N. Y.

DATED December 9, 1926.

CHRISTMAS BONUSES GIVEN.

Chelsea Exchange Bank Among Houses Making Gifts to Employes.

Four Christmas bonuses were announced yesterday.

Edward S. Rothchild, President of the Chelsea Exchange Bank, reported the distribution of extra compensation checks totaling between $20,000 and $25,000 to 150 employes yesterday. The bank doubled the compensation of last year. Those with it one year or more received one month's salary, and those in service six months to one year received two weeks' salary; those in service less than six months received one week's salary.

James Talcott, Inc., a dry goods house, authorized a Christmas bonus of from 5 to 15 per cent. of annual salaries to all employes. The company also gave capital stock to certain employes of long standing.

The investment house of Cullen & Drew distributed a month's salary to all employes.

Checks were distributed to 200 employes of the Central Mercantile Bank and Trust Company by its President, C. Stanley Mitchell, at the annual dinner last night, in the Hotel Biltmore. Each of the employes, of whom 43 are girls, received 10 per cent. of the amount of his or her salary.

TROLLEY LINE ASKS RELIEF.

Empire State Seeks Right to Drop Five Losing Routes in Oswego.

The Empire State Railroad Corporation has filed with the Public Service Commission at Albany petitions asking for permission to abandon five street railway routes in the City of Oswego. The petition says:

"The operation of the railroad on the routes described does not pay operating expenses, but, on the contrary, is a daily and constant loss to the corporation, and said loss, in conjunction with losses upon other routes in the City of Oswego, is so great as to impair the solvency of the petitioner, and threatens to destroy its ability to furnish any railroad service of any kind over any of its routes. The traffic over the lines described in the petition is so slight as to demonstrate that no public convenience or necessity is served by the operation of said railroad:"

The commission will hold a public hearing on the petition.

Garfield Smelter Breaks Record.
Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 17.—The Garfield smelter of the American Smelting and Refining Company in November broke all its previous records with a production of 30,000,000 pounds of blister copper. This plant is employing 1,200 men, against 2,000 during the peak of capacity in the World War. The greater part of this production represented smelter copper recovered from concentrates received from the Arthur and Magma plants of the Utah Apex Copper Company, 95 per cent. owned by the Kennecott Copper Corporation. Practically all this copper is shipped to the Perth Amboy, N. J., refinery of the American Smelting Company for the recovery of precious metals. This November production is a new world's record for a month's output from a single smelting plant.

MEETINGS AND ELECTIONS.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE IN NEW YORK

NOTICE OF ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Shareholders of this Bank for the election of directors and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before such meeting will be held at its banking house No. 31 Nassau Street, Tuesday, January 11, 1927, at 12 o'clock noon. The polls will remain open for one hour

THOMAS W. BOWERS, Vice President

WHOLESALE MEN

A WELL-KNOWN investment banking house of origination has openings for two wholesale men—one for the Metropolitan District and the other for out of town, including Southern territory. Proven ability selling high grade securities and wide acquaintance among dealers are necessary.

The record of our issues is exceedingly good, consequently capable, energetic salesmen find little sales resistance.

We are prepared to make a liberal commission or salary arrangement and to provide a permanent position with an excellent future. This is an opportunity to join a rapidly growing organization which has been conspicuously successful in the last few years.

To receive consideration, your reply should be detailed and will be held confidential.

Our salesmen have been advised of this advertisement.

GOOD TRADE BRINGS AN UPTURN IN WHEAT

Commission House Buying Appears in the Breaks and the Finish Is at a Gain.

PORTUGAL SEEKS GRAIN

Corn Breaks Early and Then Rallies in Sympathy With Wheat—Oats Advance.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Ill., Dec. 18.—A fairly good trade was on in wheat within a range of ⅝ to ⅞ cent, with commission house buying appearing on the breaks, and toward the last there was an upturn in sympathy with Winnipeg. The finish was at net gains of ⅜ to ⅝ cent. Removal of hedges against export sales was a factor at Winnipeg and that market closed 1⅞ to 2⅜ cents higher, with December leading. Buenos Aires gained ⅛ cent for the day and Liverpool ¼ to ⅜ pence, with prospects for smaller world's shipments and firmer Argentine freight rates a factor.

A good part of the trade was of a local character. Export sales of wheat in all positions aggregated 700,000 bushels, including 500,000 bushels Manitobas to Portugal, and that country was said to be in the market for 1,000,000 bushels more.

In the sample market No. 2 hard sold at 3½ to 4 cents and No. 1 hard 5 cents over December white. Red Winters were easier at 1 cent over for No. 2. Expectations are for a small decrease in the visible supply of wheat, while local stocks are estimated to show a small gain. A shortage of 7,111,000 bushels in the potato crop in Europe is considered a bullish factor by many in the trade. Although it has been known for some time, it has not increased buying on the part of foreigners.

Primary arrivals of wheat today were 849,000 bushels, week ago, 800,000; last year, 1,216,000. Shipments, 395,000 bushels; week ago, 684,000; last year, 489,000.

Corn closed ¼ cent lower to ⅛ cent higher, breaking early only to rally later in sympathy with wheat. A decline of 1 to 2 cents on the local spot basis was a factor in inducing selling early, but when short covering appeared offerings were not large.

Primary arrivals today, 836,000; week ago, 826,000; last year, 1,297,000; shipments, 271,000; week ago, 287,000; last year, 630,000.

Oats closed ⅜ to ⅝ cent higher, with local bulls good buyers and the finish on the deferred deliveries was within a fraction of the best prices on the crop. Rye gained ⅛ to 1 cent, with some buying that was regarded as against export business.

The Government will give its final estimate on acreage and yields of grain and all farm products on Monday. Last estimates on Winter wheat were 626,000,000 bushels, Spring, 212,000,000 bushels; all wheat, 838,000,000 bushels.

Corn, 2,694,000,000 bushels; oats, 1,328,000,000 bushels; rye, 42,000,000 bushels, and barley, 197,000,000 bushels.

WHEAT FUTURES FIRMER.

Local Market Closes With Prices at Higher Level—Trading Moderate.

Trading in wheat futures on the New York Produce Exchange yesterday was firmer in tone and moderate in volume. The market opened higher on better Liverpool cables, continued strength in the Argentine and improved foreign demand. Offerings increased on small upturns, with consequent reactions, but relative firmness at Winnipeg resulted in renewed buying and covering and a higher close.

Primary receipts were again moderate. Western weather continued cold, creating apprehension about the new crop where unprotected by snow. Deliveries on December contracts were fair.

ACTIVITY IN RUBBER MARKET

Futures Move Upward as 114 Contracts Change Hands.

For a short session, trading in crude rubber on the Rubber Exchange of New York yesterday was unusually active, with the price trend moderately up from Friday. The volume totaled 114 contracts, including ten old. Prices were 10 to 80 points higher overnight.

May, an active month, made the best gain of the day, closing at 39.30. January, February and December were all strong and at good-sized gains over Friday. March picked up the least advantage, that of 10 points.

London was very steady at the close, spot selling at 18¾d, an advance of ⅛d. Futures also rose ⅛d., with the exception of the July-September quarter, which remained unchanged.

Range of prices for the deliveries traded in follows:

COMMODITY PRICES.

Cash Markets Quiet—Few Changes Reported Are Made on the Up Side.

While the cash markets were only moderately active yesterday, not unusual for a short session, prices were uniformly steady, and in some instances small-size gains were added. Improvement was reported in wheat, rye, cotton and rubber, while other articles remained firm and unchanged from Friday.

Yesterday's closing wholesale cash prices for commodities, in the New York market unless otherwise noted, were:

COTTON CLOSES AT WEEK'S HIGH LEVEL

Reports of Full Time Operation in Lancashire Mills Encourage Broader Buying.

AWAIT GINNINGS REPORT

Evening-Up Trading Steadies Market Pending the Receipt of Government Statement Tomorrow.

A further slight advance occurred in cotton yesterday, which restored prices to previous high levels of the week and left final quotations at an advance of 3 to 17 points on the day. Reports that full time had been recommended for the American section of Lancashire mills after reduced operations existing since 1920 encouraged more general buying. With a census report on ginning due at 10 o'clock tomorrow, evening-up operations steadied the market and was accompanied by minimum selling pressure either from local or Southern sources.

The sharp recovery of 14 English points in Liverpool came as a direct result of the small private ginning estimate issued from Memphis Friday and the prospect of increased working hours for English mills. In both New Orleans and New York, traders were more inclined to reduce outstanding accounts, pending official ginning figures. From the opening, selling pressure proved less than at any time since the annual crop estimate appeared ten days ago. Demand for January carried that month to 12¼ cents and March to 12½ cents before the market ran into more cotton than was needed. A number of scale selling orders on a basis of $12.50 for March halted the improvement, and prices held within limits of about 5 points the balance of the session. A feature was the strength of March in New Orleans, which sold over New York most of the morning, while January increased its spread to 12 points over January here.

A census report on linters produced to Dec. 1 showed 408,000 bales, as compared with 416,000 last year, though mills crushed 23,000 tons more cottonseed. This indicates that machinery is not set to cut as closely as last year, with a corresponding reduction in the amount of linters per ton of seed.

After four days' hearings, the bill changing the existing system of Government cotton reports was reported out of the Agricultural Committee for debate in the House. If finally enacted into law there would be four instead of the present nine crop estimates, the first one based on conditions of Sept. 1, followed by three succeeding reports in October, November and December. The semi-monthly reports of the past three years have met with general dissatisfaction throughout the cotton trade.

The following shows the statistical position of cotton figured to yesterday by The Financial Chronicle:

	This Week Bales.	Last Week Bales.	Last Year Bales.
Port receipts	400,731	451,084	351,485

THE NEW YORK TIMES

1926 FINANCIAL-COMMERCIAL-BUSINESS FORECAST and REVIEW 1927

January 1, 1927

THIS important annual financial news feature of The New York Times will be a part of the regular issue of January 1, 1927.

CONTENTS

The review of 1926 will be a condensed chronological retrospect of great value for reference.

Forecasts for 1927 by expert correspondents at centres of the steel, grain and cotton markets — from financial correspondents of The Times at the five chief European capitals will be included.

Complete tables of range of prices and total sales, in bond and stock markets for the year and full comparative tabulations by months of foreign exchange rates during 1926 will be published. The Times accuracy and completeness in these tabulations makes its records the foremost authority.

THE TIMES is read by more brokers, bankers and investors than any other newspaper. THE TIMES financial news and advertising columns alike are regarded as the most comprehensive, reliable source of information in this field. THE TIMES is read thoroughly every day, and preserved for reference.

THE TIMES publishes more financial advertising than any other publication in the world, and its censorship to exclude the announcements of undesirable firms is carefully maintained.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, up to and including December 2, published more than 3,000,000 agate lines of financial advertising in 1926. This is a new high record for THE TIMES and is the first time that any publication in the world has published any such volume of financial advertisements. THE TIMES financial advertising volume is nearly twice that published by the next New York newspaper.

The New York Times

Francis H. Sisson, Vic -President of the Guaranty Trust Company, New York, said of The New York Times:

"... The New York Times is without question the most valuable single adverti ing med um in the United States. . .".

The New York Times is the channel through wh ch the business and financial world makes its announcements. The service which The Times renders to the business and financial men of this country in its advertising and news columns is unequaled by any other publication.

The Merchant's Point of View

GENERAL conditions all over the country continue to be the subject of favorable reports. What exceptions there are pertain to certain agricultural sections, and it is noteworthy that there is less pessimism than there was in the cotton-growing states. Prominent factors down South have been taking account of things lately and are calling attention to the fact that the prosperity in that part of the country is not wholly dependent on cotton, which produces only about one-quarter of the income of the States of the cotton belt. In general, unemployment is low, except in certain seasonal occupations like road work, agriculture and construction; savings deposits of one kind or another are larger than they were a year ago at this time and the volume of business transactions remains satisfactory. Most of the trading in evidence is at retail, for holiday and gift purchases. This continues at a high peak, although it was interrupted for a day or two last week by rather inclement weather. It is expected to come in with something of a rush during the present week because of last-minute calls by tardy buyers. In the primary markets a little more confidence in the prospects is observable, resulting from the nature of the inquiries coming in rather than from any immediate business being transacted. It promises to be well after the turn of the year before trading on a large scale is manifested. Out-of-town buyers during the past week were comparatively few in number and most who came were after odds and ends for filling in or sales purposes.

After the Wastes of Distribution.

Preliminaries have been agreed upon between the Bureau of the Census and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States for an investigation of the wastes of distribution. This is a natural and logical sequence to the work, which has been in progress for some years, to eliminate waste in processes of manufacture. By standardizing both methods and products and getting rid of needless sorts and sizes a vast saving has already been effected. But cheapness of manufacture does not mean cheapness of products to the consumer. The great spread in every line is between wholesale and retail prices. This is universally recognized, but how to overcome the difficulty is one of the things for which no adequate remedy has yet been suggested. It is only with what may be called the mechanics of distribution that any general plans for improvement have been suggested. Better packing and shipping methods, store-door delivery and the like are only a few of the directions to which attention has been turned. But improvements of this kind can only, in the nature of things, reduce a very small percentage of the expense incurred in moving goods to the ultimate consumer. The largest accretion of cost comes after the merchandise, whatever it may be, reaches the retailer, bulk is broken and individual small-sized packages take the place of car-load lots or huge packing cases. Then come in other factors of expense, such as rent and other overhead, interest on investment and service.

Where the Expenses Come In.

So far as interest on investment is concerned, this varies with the rate of turnover. For slow-moving goods which remain in stock an average of six months the interest charge figures three times as large as on goods which have a turnover six times a year, and the mark-up must be made to correspond. The rate for overhead depends in great measure on the volume of business. When it comes to service, the most uncertain factor is encountered. There is a great gap between the expense of this item in chain stores and those which have house deliveries, C. O. D.'s and credit accounts, with their accompaniment of canceled orders and returns of goods. In merchandise where the style element is the controlling one an uncertain percentage of loss has to be figured on as the season wanes, though this is being gradually reduced by the vogue for piecemeal buying. If one were to take into account merely the size of the mark-up by stores, it would appear as though they must all be prosperous to a surprising extent. In actuality, however, the margin of profit percentage is in many cases very small. Competition and the exactions of customers have tended to increase greatly the cost of service, and there are no indications yet that the limit in this respect has been reached. But every bit of this expense must be paid by the customer in the enhanced prices made thereby necessary. How this great item of distribution cost is to be reduced is a problem. It certainly cannot be done without the cooperation of the general public. In Italy, it is said, Mussolini is tackling the problem by compelling retailers to show both wholesale and retail prices on their goods, so that customers can judge whether a fair profit only is charged, and the Government is to decide what is a fair profit. There may be some surprises when the decree is in operation.

It Depends on Whose Ox Is Gored.

Every time some foreign country increases its tariff rates on American products or adopts a vexatious customs rule making things more difficult for an exporter here there is a wail of protest and expostulation from the State and Commerce Departments. But when this country does things of the same kind resentment is expressed when foreign countries put in a protest or retaliate. What is sauce for the goose is apparently not sauce for the gander in this matter of foreign trade. Recently the American Manufacturers' Export Association presented an itemized list of the trade barriers interposed by a number of foreign countries. On the face of it the list looks as though the purpose of the laws and customs regulations enumerated was to prevent importations or to make them as difficult as possible, with no corresponding advantages to the respective countries which had adopted them. But the list was taken hold of by the National Council of Importers and Traders, which analyzed the items and, for each one, was able to produce a corresponding one in the present American tariff and the customs regulations of this country. This result is given in a "deadly parallel" recently prepared by the council for the American Committee of the International Chamber of Commerce. Every absurdity complained of as practiced by foreign Governments is shown to be duplicated here and sometimes even more accentuated. It makes improving reading and prompts the suggestion that it is well to set one's own house in order before finding fault with those of others. Then, too, it brings up the adage that he who seeks equity should do equity.

One Way of Stifling an Inquiry.

At odd times for several years past motions were made toward an investigation of the aluminum monopoly. In the Presidential campaign of 1924 the Democratic candidate had something to say about it, but as he was not elected the matter did not get beyond talk. After a while, however, the matter was taken up by the United States Senate in the form of a resolution to investigate. It was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. But, in order to bedevil the issue, there were coupled two other investigations. One of these was for an exhaustive inquiry into the textile industries and the other was for a similar probe of the steel industry. This joinder of dissimilar things appears to have produced the desired result. When the Senate committee faced the problem that had been given to them, they began to figure out its scope and probable cost. No good purpose could be served, it was shown, unless the inquiries were thorough, covering each principal type of mill in the several industries. The cost of such a work would run into the tens of thousands of dollars and it would take much time to gather the necessary data. So the committee reported to the Senate, which thereupon postponed indefinitely the consideration of the matter. The subject will now be allowed to slumber until it is resurrected in some other form in the future.

Prices of Cotton and Cotton Goods.

For a while during the past week cotton prices showed an upward tendency. This appeared to be due to the course of buying rather than to any new developments affecting the size of the crop. It seems, also, that nothing tangible has as yet been done toward withholding from the market several million bales in order to keep up prices. In such plans a feature is to require a pledge from growers who are to be aided that they will reduce their acreage next year. But there is no way of keeping them to such a promise. There is also another consideration. Should the carryover of cotton be as large as is indicated, the next crop would have to be a record low one if prices are to be pegged up at anywhere near the point which would be generally regarded as satisfactory. On the other hand, with a freer market and low prices more cotton would go into consumption and in new directions, thus cutting down the carryover. It is noteworthy, in connection with this aspect, to call attention to the action just taken by the English spinners of American cotton. Since 1920 they have curtailed the weekly working hours. Now, with cheaper cotton, they have resolved to go on a full-time basis. The ginning report which is due this week is expected to corroborate the latest of the crop estimates. In the goods market adjustments are steadily going on. Prices of heavyweight knit underwear were lowered substantially during the past week by New York State mills as well as by Southern ones. Denim prices were also cut drastically. Ginghams, however, were placed at the prevailing levels and prices guaranteed to April. Gray goods prices sagged somewhat. The fear is expressed in some quarters that there may be an overproduction of Southern cloths. Trading is still somewhat restricted in knit goods, but is expected to pick up within a fortnight or so.

Conditions in Wool and Woolen Trades.

Trading in wool is quite limited in scope at the present, both here and abroad. Buying is confined to immediate needs. Prices are, in most instances, in favor of buyers, although the finest varieties of merinos are still quite strongly held. While no great drop in price levels is expected, there is still less likelihood of any advance. Mills have ceased being apprehensive of any material change in conditions and are content to seek supplies as they are needed. Orders for fabrics are still slow in coming, but the mills are fairly busy on Spring weaves. There will be further activity as the manufacturing clothiers hear from retail dealers after the holiday business is over. The Fall openings of suitings will not take place until after the middle of next month. Meanwhile, some little movement in overcoatings is under way, though the main buying of these goods is yet somewhat far off. The general tendency of buyers is to hold off as long as possible, as they feel there is nothing to be lost by delay. Purchasing of women's wear fabrics is almost at a standstill for the time being and may remain so until after the turn of the year. Style tendencies are, however, closely studied and a fair business is expected, once it starts. Gratification is expressed on all sides at the settlements of the garment strikes, more especially so as the agreements are likely to be of a more permanent character than those under which operations were carried on before the labor disputes became so acute.

SO-CALLED MENACE OF CHAIN STORES

The Experience of One Merchant in California Is Quoted to the Contrary.

That chain stores, when properly and fairly operated, are not the menace to independent retailers which they are so frequently said to be by their critics was asserted yesterday by E. C. Sams, President of the J. C. Penney Company, Inc., in reply to a question on this point put to him by a TIMES reporter. On the other hand, Mr. Sams said, they have been found to benefit independent merchants. He continued:

"Most of the criticism of chain store organizations has come from writers on commercial topics who fall into the error of putting all such organizations into a single class and condemning the lot with no effort at differentiation. I have spent the greater part of my life in the chain store business as a member of the J. C. Penney Company, and I know how unfair it is to give to all systems, as a group, the praise or blame that would be just and fair to each of them individually.

"It seems to me that the most logical place to look for comments regarding the competition of chain stores is the independent merchants who have to face it. There is plenty of this comment, no doubt, and that not all of it condemns the chain store is shown by a letter recently written to a Middle Western trade paper by a merchant in a certain California town in which we have a store. I think it will be found interesting."

This is the letter to which Mr. Sams referred:

"Why admit that the chain store is a 'great menace' to the merchant? Why not see first whether the menace is as great as supposed? Owing to the terrific increase in the stores of the J. C. Penney Company, we might take it for granted that this is the particular 'menace' referred to.

"Well, let's see about the menace. Take our own case—a town with, principally, country trade, population about 10,000. About ten years ago we bought out this store, and a month later the Penney Company opened here. We were told afterward that the former proprietor was anxious to sell out because he knew the Penney Company had leased a store and was going to open up. He omitted to tell us of this. Had we known it, we should not have cared, for, in those days, we did not know that the Penney Company stores were a 'menace.' 'Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise.'

"When they opened at first they did take the wind out of our sails and out of our sales as well—for a while. Well, why not? They were new; this store was old. The trade of this store was less than one-fourth of what it is now. They did throw out some 'corking' leaders. Fortunately, we did not know that they were a 'menace,' so we did not weep over the matter, but started to investigate and see what we could do about it.

"Had we known they were a 'menace,' we might have laid down—maybe; then, again, maybe not. Perhaps the Viking blood of our way-back ancestors might have asserted itself, and caused us to fight to the last ditch. Luckily, we did not know what most of the merchants today know—or think they know—about the 'menace' stuff.

"Well, to cut a short story long, we are here yet—after all these years—doing business in the same block that they are. In the next block is the Woolworth concern, also doing a big business. As for the Penney Company, they are doing a big, successful, profitable business. They are good, clean competition, their managers and employes are selected from the cleanest and best.

"Now, 'what is the merchant going to do about it?' you ask. Why, he is going to watch their methods and copy so as much of their system as his store can absorb. Next, he is going to get some of the trade that they draw to the town that never used to come there. And he is going to get more of the business that went to the mail order houses and to the large near-by cities. He is going to get more of this for the reason that the chain store draws more of it to the town where it is located, and a lot of the trade spills over to other merchants.

"I should say that the chain store is an example of progress and that the merchant who watches and acts on its methods will profit likewise.

"'Is the overhead of the store less than that of the regular store?' you ask. Well, let's see. Where their old leases expire they have to pay the newer rents. Usually they contract long leases, with privilege of a longer lease beyond the period named, and, of course, usually at the same rental. That often carries them many years into the future at low rental.

"Take the local case. The Penney Company had a very favorable five-year lease and five-year privilege at the same rent. There was a real bargain in a lease—$100 per month for ten years, when it became worth at least $300 five years before the lease expired. In other words, about $12,000 was made on the increased lease value in the last ten years. But the lease has expired and now they pay $300 per month; yet the store they have was bid on at $350. The owner would rather have the chain 'menace' store at $300 than some other line at $350. Oh, yes, did I forget to mention that we had bought the building they were in during these ten years? Guess I did. Well, we bought it out of our store profits, and we think so kindly of the concern that we refused $350 for the location and only asked them $300. We didn't even tell them about it. As to other overhead, we fail to see how they can make it any less than any other store.

"Are they good advertisers? Yes, they are—very good. And they spend a lot more for advertising than does the average merchant. They are good merchants, too. Let the other fellow copy their ideas. He will not have so much time to howl over his imagined competition.

"From this letter," resumed Mr. Sams, "it would appear that chain stores are not all 'menaces,' and that all chain store systems do not set up in business only for the sake of taking all the money they can out of the towns in which they operate and leaving nothing in return.

"One of the six rules under which the Penney Company's business is conducted is that the company shall work for the upbuilding of every community in which it is represented. The company insists that its managers must prove themselves to be as worthy in citizenship as they are in business. They are in reality partners in our organization, and when the company pays taxes in a community it wants to see personal effort employed to justify the investment made.

"The company aims to employ local salespeople whenever possible. However, they must measure up to the high standards already found advisable. The company pays salaries always equal to those paid by other merchants. In addition, a bonus is paid to women employes, with a possible manager-partnership as the reward for the men who qualify with us. Above all, we try to instill into every sales person the desire not only to sell but to serve."

SEES A CHANGE FROM JOBBING OF GARMENTS

Most Stock Houses, It Is Said, Will Turn to Manufacturing Their Own Goods.

There is a pronounced trend away from the jobbing of coats and suits into the making of this merchandise on the "inside shop" basis, according to Joseph J. Cohn of the firm of Rosing & Cohn. He predicted yesterday that action will be taken by many larger jobbers during the course of the year to become manufacturers with shops on their own premises. His firm, reputed the second oldest stock house in the coat and suit industry, has already taken such action and from now on will manufacture its own garments.

"Just as a number of years ago, because of labor developments, there was an overwhelming trend away from inside manufacturing to jobbing, there is now a swing in the opposite direction," Mr. Cohn said. "Primarily, this is due to the fact that the jobbing system, dominant as it has since grown to be, cannot satisfy the growing interest of discriminating retailers in the quality and style elements of women's apparel.

"In other words, the buyer is trading up and is getting away from the habit, cultivated during the past several seasons, of devoting so much attention to the price factor that the design, workmanship and fabrics did not receive anything like adequate consideration.

"Efforts of stock houses to satisfy these demands for 'price' merchandise resulted in a slump in creative work, a decline in style value, skimping and other questionable practices. Contractors in turn sought to produce garments as cheaply as possible instead of as efficiently as possible. It thus became harder and harder for retailers to secure the type of merchandise they wanted. In addition, prices were not stable. Stores often found that their competitors were able to buy similar merchandise for less because they bought it later. Lack of individuality in the merchandise further increased the competition between retailers on price.

"The jobber found himself in much the same position. When he was offered what he considered to be a good style by the contractor, he was apt to find the same style offered to all his competitors. During the course of its travels the price of this model went lower and lower so that the jobber who bought first generally was 'stuck.' The factor of quality was only given scant attention in the production of the merchandise.

"Now jobbers find this situation increasingly serious. They are going back to manufacturing, because in that way they can produce individual styles. There is no other way out. Competition is not as keen in well made merchandise. In garments made and styled under personal supervision, price is not the dominating consideration. If the style is there, the retailer is always willing to pay a fair price for the merchandise, because it is worth more than the inferior production which has glutted the market during recent seasons. The retailers will find that they will not have to take unnecessary markdowns. Both retailers and manufacturers will save money because at least 25 per cent. of the merchandise that both have sold at a loss has been of the inferior type produced under the jobber-contractor system."

GOODS WHICH APPEAL TO THE STORE BUYERS

They Include Dresses, Sports Garments, Suits and Coats, Millinery and Silks.

In their special market report, Kirby, Block & Fischer, resident buyers, say that three-piece costume suits continue to be featured by dress manufacturers for early Spring wear. Nearly all of these garments are made entirely of silk. Some show the short coat with elaborately embroidered blouse. New chiffon afternoon dresses are being displayed, all of which are tailored and have long sleeves. For dinner wear, light colored georgette dresses are selling readily.

"In millinery, the new sport felt hat is outstanding. It is covered with georgette crepe and has all-over stitched designs of tennis rackets and plain criss-cross stitching. The shape is of the medium-brim variety, with slightly rolled back and high pinched crown. Some are faced with either grosgrain ribbon or straw. Leading colors are French blue, Grecian rose, monkey skin, coral, white and goblin blue. A new sport item featured by the better grade manufacturers is a hat, scarf and parasol set fashioned of printed silk, showing scenes in national parks in this country. The merchandise is intended for Winter resort wear. The hats are of the medium size shape and have a slightly rolled back.

"During the past two weeks we have had requests for silks for January sales. The fabrics wanted comprise flat crêpes, suede crêpes, romaine crêpes and good quality georgettes. They are being ordered in the new shaded color combinations, including Copenhagen blues, rose, tan and green tints. There is a slight call for gray and also Goya red."

"Silk and wool combination sports garments," the report continues, "have a promising outlook in the two-piece styles. For evening wear the georgette gown embroidered in rhinestones or spangles is still in active demand. Dresses of satin combined with Elizabeth crepe are being freely ordered. Black, beige and monkey skin are the outstanding shades.

"A favorable demand for suits is expected during the Spring. It is the general opinion that a satisfactory volume of business will be done in garments retailing from $29.50 to $49.50. Suits of plain materials are being shown, as well as ones of sports fabrics in tan or gray. The jackets of some suits are of plain material, with the skirts of men's hairline striped fabrics of contrasting color.

"Manufacturers of finer grade coats are now showing their Spring lines. Suede fabrics are outstanding in these offerings. Tan and a few of the pastel shades are favored colors. Mixture sports coats in pastel colors and bright plaid effects are also being shown. A substantial demand continues for sports coats to be used for the latter part of this month and early January. In these coats bright plaid effects are wanted. The coats are trimmed with badger, lynx, imitation skunk, cross fox and the cheaper grades of wolf.

"There is also a call for light colored coats in such shades as thrush, tan, sandalwood, green and harbor blue, trimmed with shawl collars of light, long haired furs. The demand for Winter coats is small and confined mostly to gracklehead shades.

GIFT DEPARTMENTS AS PROFIT MAKERS

They Help Stimulate an All-the-Year-Round Business in Novelty Merchandise.

Growing consumer interest in gift novelties of all kinds has brought about an increased realization of the possibilities of the separate gift department as a potential profit-maker for the store, according to Alfred Fanti. A more concentrated effort to specialize on unusual merchandise, together with more effective methods of displaying these articles, he said yesterday, has developd a continuous twelve months' business on gift sales, which were formerly confined largely to the months of November and December, when Christmas business is at its peak.

"Many department stores," he pointed out, "now give prominent space on the main floor to the display of smaller gift items, while larger articles which come under the heading of decorative household objects are usually found in separate sections adjacent to the interior decorating, or house-furnishings, departments.

"The separate grouping of articles in this manner suggests their appropriateness as gifts and simplifies the customer's task of choosing. Some stores go still further in this grouping plan by featuring special tables of various gift items at uniform prices.

"One important factor in the promotion of gift sales is an attractive window display that brings before the public the store's prestige for securing gift merchandise that is new and differently styled. In the case of imported goods, increased interest is aroused by having window displays of gift items arranged according to the country of their origin. 'Gifts from Italy,' for instance, would include Florentine leather goods, Venetian glassware, majolica and reproductions of antiques. 'From France' would come luxury articles with a feminine appeal, such as enticing perfumes in elaborate containers, novelty jewelry, boudoir accessories and the like.

"An all-year-round business in gift merchandise is further stimulated by appropriate displays and advertisements in connection with graduations, confirmations and other special events of local significance.

"Stores also find it profitable to follow up newspaper announcements of engagements, weddings and anniversaries. Moreover, the important fact that every day is somebody's birthday should not be lost sight of in the promotion of gift sales. Membership lists of bridge clubs offer still another possibility for creating gift business.

"While most of the gift articles bear the foreign label an increasingly large number of American novelties have come to the fore. This is especially true of glassware novelties, as is evidenced by the fact that many manufacturers who formerly produced staple glass and chinaware have now turned their attention to novelty goods in their specific lines.

"Smokers' articles, such as cigarette boxes, ash trays, lighters, holders and the like, are constantly appearing in attractive new forms. Small pieces of decorative furniture, such as magazine racks and bookcases, lacquer-finished and hand-painted, as well as fancy lamps, are other domestic wares which find a ready sale in gift departments.

"Even once humble household articles appear in a new guise as gift items. Bread boards and knives, for instance, are attractively decorated with hand-painted designs, while even small aluminum staples are rendered more saleable by being placed in artistic gift boxes.

"Imported articles of an unusual nature go a long way toward supplying that 'something different' which is the life of gift departments. Small clocks of unusual form, musical cigarette cases, decorative pillows and dolls, fancy art goods, pottery and numerous other wares produced in the workshops of Europe are novelties which 'style' the gift shop of every large department store."

SHOULD WATCH CREDITS.

Prompt Settlement of Claims Advisable for Garment Men.

Business conditions at this time of the year call for unusually careful attention to credits on the part of manufacturers of women's ready-to-wear merchandise, according to a statement sent out yesterday by the United Women's Wear League of America. The Fall season is generally regarded as a signally profitable one to the garment business, both wholesale and retail, and the manner in which the money accruing from the profits is disposed of has much to do with the stability of business in general and credit in particular.

"In view of this," the statement says, "members of the league are being advised to be particularly attentive to accounts that have recently been opened, or which are in the least doubtful. Where relations between manufacturer and retailer are of long and well-established standing there is no cause for watchfulness, but in the more doubtful cases it behooves the manufacturer to see that his claims are promptly settled.

"With some retailers it is the custom to favor certain interests with a prompt settlement and to make others wait. Thus, personal obligations are settled, the banks paid, and certain preferred creditors are satisfied first, to the detriment of the remaining creditors.

"Therefore, it is up to the manufacturer to see that his claims are not deferred in favor of others. As many trade associations, such as the league, are ready and willing to deal with retailers who put off settlement of merchandise obligations without legitimate reason, manufacturers are enabled to press such claims with the full support of the organization to which they belong."

RAW SILK MARKETS.

Transactions Comparatively Light, With Prices Unchanged.

The raw silk market at Yokohama was quiet during the week. Sales on the Bourse were 4,945 bales and in the open market 3,850 bales, according to Berizzi Brothers Company. Yen prices at the close were unchanged from those of the beginning of the week. Exchange closed slightly easier at 49⅝ for ninety days' sight draft, New York.

Holiday influences prevailed in the local market. Prices continued practically unchanged at $6 for double extra cracks and $5.75 for best No. 1s to extras. The lower grades were slightly easier. Orders for Spring fabrics from retailers continue slow in developing.

No business of importance was done at Canton. Prices held firm, however, on the basis of $4.15 to $4.25 for 14-16s and $3.75 to $3.80 for 20-22s and 22-26s. Steam filatures continued nominal at Shanghai. Tussahs were steady at $3.10. The Milan market showed no change as far as increased buying for American accounts was concerned.

REMEMBER
The 100 Neediest Cases.

SANTA CLAUS EXHIBITS.

Value of Them to the Big Stores Considered Established.

To those merchandising skeptics who have questioned the value of Santa Claus exhibits of one kind or another as builders of business for department stores a recent announcement of one of the big local stores comes almost as a direct answer. In this announcement it was said that an average of 5,000 small boys and girls called on the store's Santa Claus daily and that, up to the time it was made, some 60,000 had come to see him. So marked is the pulling power of the mythical Saint that it was found necessary by this store, in making holiday plans, to locate his realm several floors away from the toy department in order to permit business to be done.

While merchandising experts agree that it is impossible to trace direct sales resulting from the crowds of children brought to a store by such displays, most of them admit that they are good "promotion stunts," if nothing else. The implanting of any store's name on the minds of the rising generation as a result of them, it is agreed, is a prospective source of future business even if there are no immediate sales results. In fact, there is a disposition on the part of some merchandising authorities to believe that the various stores which put on Santa Claus displays do so just as much to produce future business, through the building up of interest and good will among children, as "at once" sales. Were this not so, it is contended, the high cost of putting on many of these displays would not make them worth while from a commercial point of view.

RETURN OF GOODS EVIL.

Is Declared to Be Not Always the Fault of the Customer.

To a substantial extent the evil that lies in the returned goods problem lies with the policy of the store or the lack of it, according to John B. Guernsey of the Controllers' Congress of the National Retail Dry Goods Association. The results of many investigations of the matter, he says, show that fully half of the returns in a normal store with a liberal return policy arise from poor selling, incorrect size or color, defective merchandise and approvals—these are the store's fault rather than the customer's.

About 25 per cent. of the returns, he continues, arise from forcing selling, in the overzeal of the sales people to force merchandise on customers too weak or too fickle in their decisions to say "no." The C. O. D. system helps in this forced selling as every merchant knows. The return of C. O. D.'s in some stores runs as high as 35 per cent.

The remaining 25 per cent. of returns, the studies show, may be charged up to that trait of woman which makes her delight in the unrestricted privilege of changing her mind at any time about anything, especially after she has heard a few sarcastic comments from her friends and relatives about her latest purchase, or has seen some one else wearing the frock she bought last week.

"Why does Mrs. Customer feel free to return anything which strikes her fancy or fails to strike her fancy, without consciousness of imposing on her favorite store?" asks Mr. Guernsey. "Because her favorite store has told her over and over again through salespeople and advertisements and otherwise: 'If you don't like it, just bring it back at any time.'"

COLORS FOR SPRING HOSE.

What the Leading Ones Will Be Still a Matter of Doubt.

Although it is yet too early to get an accurate idea of what the leading Spring colors in women's full-fashioned hosiery will be, it was said here yesterday that there is every indication that the so-called nude shades will lose little, if any, of the popularity which they have enjoyed during the past several seasons. It is not expected that they will play the dominant part in the Spring hosiery color scheme which they have in the last year or two, but, especially in the cheaper ranges, large sales are looked for.

The prospect for the continuance of the present vogue for gunmetal hose with black heels is apparently not so bright. There is still quite a little furor over them in the local market, but it is said to be due more to the difficulty that the mills are having in filling orders already on their books than to the receipt of new business. The prediction was made yesterday by one of the best-posted men in the trade that black-heel gunmetal hose would be "through" as an important market factor by Feb. 1, if not before that date. He based this prediction on the fact that gunmetals are essentially a Fall and Winter "number."

To Go With the Hunter Company.

John D. Sculley, formerly Vice President, Director and member of the Executive Board of Claflins Incorporated, will on Jan. 3 become associated with the Hunter Manufacturing and Commission Company of this city as manager of the bedspread and towel department. Mr. Sculley was associated with the Claflin organization under its various names for twenty-eight years, having become connected with it as an office boy in 1898. A year later he joined the staff of the firm's white goods and linen department, which was then under the management of G. V. Cartwright. In 1915 Mr. Sculley assumed charge of this department and continued in this capacity until the recent liquidation of the Claflin business.

NOVELTY LINENS TAKE PLACE OF STAPLES

So Irish Product Loses Out to That of Germany, Czechoslovakia and Belgium.

The European household linen industry, or at least that part of it which is located in Germany and Czechoslovakia and to some extent in Belgium, is more stabilized at present than at any other time since the war, and on a reasonably conservative basis. This statement was made yesterday by Julius Straus, who is President of the Linen Products Corporation and who has just returned from a six weeks' study of the foreign linen situation.

"Conditions in Ireland do not warrant the same optimistic feeling as those in Germany and Czechoslovakia," said Mr. Straus. "While Belgium is progressing, the situation there is not quite so good as in the latter countries. The price of household linens in those two markets is today about at its lowest point.

"During the process of reorganization that has been going on in European industry during the last eight years there has naturally been a very marked weeding out of those concerns which have not been financially able to cope with the disrupted and fallen market. In this weeding out process the relation between supply and demand has become more or less equalized, until at present the sources of supply have been reduced to a point where demand is gradually but surely exceeding the production capacities of those manufacturers who were not forced out of business.

"One of the main reasons why Germany and Czechoslovakia have been able to gain control of the situation is that they have been closely following the trend of the times, in practically ceasing to make purely staple linens. In their place they have turned to the production of novelties, which have been so strongly in vogue during the past few years.

"Manufacturers of linens in Ireland, on the other hand, have been slow to abandon the traditions of their ancient industry. For centuries, and justly so, they have prided themselves on their fine linens, table damasks, &c. However, their slowness to fall in line with the trend of things in the merchandising world, coupled with the trade-disrupting effects of internal political conditions, has worked strongly against them. They continue to stick to the making of staple lines in the face of the universal call for merchandise of a novelty nature.

"In the United States there is a definite tendency on the part of very many families to live in smaller quarters than was the custom some years ago. In those days large groups at dinner were regular features in thousands of homes. This is not so today in a great number of cases, because many families have been forced by necessity or desire to move into smaller houses or apartments, in few of which is there room to accommodate the large dining room tables of the past. In fact, in many homes there is no longer any dining room. The result is that fancy sets—luncheon sets, bridge sets, &c.—have to a very large extent replaced staple linens of the older types, and the linen industry has been changed from one of staples to one of novelties.

"In my opinion Germany and Czechoslovakia are facing a prosperous future, so far as their linen industries are concerned. Prices of household linens are at bottom. While the market for these goods may not change immediately, it will assume a rising tendency in a very short time. Those buyers in this country who are watching the linen markets of the world will agree with me that the time has come when they can no longer hope to profit from a decline in European prices."

Some Gray Goods Were Sold.

Some business was done in the local gray goods market yesterday morning, although it did not run into large volume. Printcloth sales of the day were few, but among them were spot 38½-inch 64-60s at 6¼ cents. There was also trading in spot 37½-inch 64-104, 4.37-yard sateens at 11 cents and in 38½-inch 64-88, 4.70-yard sateens, at 10 cents. All of the foregoing goods were in the East. In the sheetings business was done in spot 36-inch 6.1lbs (44-40s) at 4¾ cents. Although the nominal asking price for 37-inch 2.85-yard sheetings is 7⅞ cents, reports were current in the market that there had been trading in them at an eighth less.

Notes on Trade and Industry Abroad

Power Stations for Iceland.

A Norwegian electric power company is planning the erection of six power stations in Iceland, according to a report from the Consulate General at Oslo, Norway. The total capacity will amount to 900,000 horsepower.

To Tax Foreign Companies.

A yearly tax of 5s per £1,000 (¼ per 1,000) on the registered capital is to be imposed after Jan. 1 on all foreign companies having a place of business in South Africa. If no local subsidiary company is registered by Jan. 1, the tax will be levied on the basis of the total registered capital of the American corporation.

No Import Duties on Foods.

A Portuguese decree-law exempts olive oil (up to 5 degrees acidity), rice, potatoes, beans and oats from import duties, the 1 per cent. ad valorem surtax and consular fees, effective immediately. This action has been taken on account of the scarcity and high prices of food products of primary necessity on the Portuguese market.

South Africa's Mineral Output.

The Union of South Africa's mineral output during the first ten months of 1926 was valued at over £48,300,000, representing an increase of £3,000,000 over the production value for the same period of 1925. The gold output value was greater by over £1,000,000, and the values for coal and tin also increased substantially. The production of copper and osmiridium silver decreased.

Japanese Cottons in Rumania.

In 1921 and 1922 the United States was the principal source of the Rumanian imports of gray sheetings, but has since been displaced in this trade by Japan and by Czechoslovakia and other European countries. Japan is not the leading source for these imports, much of its gain having been made at the expense of American goods, according to a report from Consul J. Rives Childs, Bucharest.

Indian Irrigation Works.

An announcement has been made in the Mysore Representative Assembly that sanction has been accorded for an extensive program of irrigation works, to be completed within the next three years at a total cost of over 1,200,000 rupees. (The rupee is now worth $0.35.) The restoration of tanks and the opening and improving of feeder channels in various parts of the State form the major part of the program.

Freight Station for Florence.

The Campo di Marte and the Rifredi stations, Florence, Italy, will be enlarged and a large station for sorting freight, similar to that of the Simplon station at Milan, is projected. This new freight station will have yard space for entire freight trains, which will be made up for any direction before leaving the yard. It will be erected in the vicinity of Rifredi, the industrial suburb of Florence.

Exports From Australia.

The tendency during recent years for Australia's commerce to seek channels is of more than ordinary interest. Exports which formerly went almost exclusively to the United Kingdom are now going in increasing quantities to Japan, Germany, France, Italy and the United States, and imports, especially from Japan and the United States, have increased at the expense of Germany and to some extent of the United Kingdom also.

Exports of German Rags.

Germany exported 73,588 metric tons of rags during the first eight months of 1926, of which the United States took 46,250 tons. From all over Europe, including Russia and Rumania, Germany collected rags for shipment via Hamburg. This year, on account of low prices, amounts handled are said to be smaller than usual. It is reported that German authorities are in favor of a convention with the United States, feeling that some form of trade regulations should be adopted by the dealers of the two countries.

Automatic Telephone in Spain.

The first automatic telephone central station erected in Spain by the Compañia Telefonica Nacional de España was inaugurated recently at Santander. The President of the company stated that in approximately twelve months the company had erected over 19,000 miles of telephone line, that buildings had been constructed in Barcelona, Zaragoza and Madrid and that a considerable amount of additional work had been performed, representing a total investment of approximately $21,300,000.

Aid for Japanese Industries.

In an endeavor to further encourage home industry, the Government of Japan has under consideration a law which would either place a subsidy on a number of industries or else grant them certain tax exemptions, according to a cable from Commercial Attaché C. E. Herring, Tokio. The dye, chemical, automotive, machinery, cotton, wool, aluminum and raw-silk industries are among those mentioned. It is also probable that the tariff on certain home-produced dyes will be further increased.

To Join Europe's Steel Trust.

The domestic industries have at last reached an agreement at to the basis of Czechoslovakia's participation in the European steel cartel. Negotiations will be carried on in Paris during this month, and it is expected that a quota of 1,500,000 tons will be allotted to Czechoslovakia if and when this country joins the agreement. Within the country negotiations are also being conducted with a view to developing domestic cartels; organizations thus far engaged in the movement are those in the paper, shoe, plate glass and wire industries.

Reduced Hours for Farm Hands.

A decision by the State Employes' Board of New South Wales as to the number of hours of labor which employers can require of agricultural workers in that State limits it to fifty hours per week for harvest hands and to fifty-two hours for permanent farm hands. Work performed in excess of these limits is to be paid for at the rate of time and a half. The award also specifies that completion of twelve months' full service shall entitle the worker to one week's leave of absence on full pay. Legal holidays are also to be allowed permanent employes, with pay at full rate.

A RARE OPPORTUNITY.

One of our clients, a manufacturer of a very profitable, patented, staple commodity used in every home, is ready to engage in a program of expansion. The product has been nationally advertised, nationally endorsed and carries a bonded money-back guarantee. This article is admittedly far superior to the products of any of its competitors, some of whom do an annual business reaching eight figures, and has possibilities for development that are unlimited. This rare opportunity holds amazing profits and an attractive share in the corporation to the individual or group who will prove satisfactory to our client. We will deal directly with principals only and they will be requested to furnish information regarding their ability to furnish $150,000, payable in quarterly instalments, before we will arrange an interview with our client. Address the Vice President, Caples Company, Grand Central Terminal.

ALPS WINTER SPORTS ATTRACT AMERICANS

Keen Air and Friendly Welcome in English Contribute to Visitors' Enjoyment.

FEBRUARY THE BEST MONTH

Resorts Are Then Less Crowded and Weather Is Better for Skiing and Skating.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, Nov. 29.—Many citizens of the United States are no doubt familiar with the scene at a Swiss mountain railway station during the Winter sports season. A real holiday feeling is in the air, the English language predominates, hotel and even railway porters displaying remarkable fluency, and even those who have been traveling twelve or twenty-four hours on a stretch, from Paris or London, begin to feel invigorated by the keen Swiss air and the friendly welcome they receive.

In these days, too, of the "shingle" and the powder puff—not to speak of the lipstick—and the curtailed skirt, the feminine contingent no longer present the disheveled and travel-worn appearance which even a youthful or a hardened traveler found it hard to avoid in the days of hairpins, petticoats and powderless noses.

True, there are still those among Winter sportswomen who would scorn any toilet aid other than soap and water and still prefer to "bind their hair," and these, indeed, are often among the keenest on the ski slope or the ice rink. But it is no longer the rule to look "a fright" after a long journey, even when it has included a rough Channel crossing, for much has been attained with regard to traveling gear of all kinds that tends to lessen fatigue and discomfort.

The mountain railway end of the journey is usually enjoyed by all. The playground has been reached and dull care is left behind in the mists which frequently obscure the low-lying regions and through which the little train emerges at a certain height into a white, sparkling landscape, dazzling in the bright sunshine.

The difficulty for the average visitor is to know which place to choose. There are altogether about forty Winter resorts in Switzerland, all claiming perfection as regard skiing, skating and curling conditions, but as a matter of fact, out of the forty about half may be said to supply all the needs of a first-class Winter resort. The more highly situated a place is the more expensive it usually is, and it as a rule possesses the best hotels.

In a mild Winter there is a better chance of having good ice as well as abundance of snow if one goes as high as possible; but on the other hand, in a normal Winter resorts situated at an altitude of 3,500 to 4,000 feet are just as good and, in some cases, if it is a hard Winter, the latter are even pleasanter than a very high resort, for not only is the cold less intense, but the ice rinks remain in better condition for skating than they do in a higher altitude, where the sun is apt to spoil the ice at midday.

Some hotels in certain resorts are exclusively in the hands of private British tourist agencies and are patronized for the most part by British and American people. Some of these tourist agencies can offer a fortnight or three weeks, combining railway and hotel accommodations, at less than it would cost a person doing it independently, for the railway companies grant reduced fares to parties of thirty persons, thus enabling tourist agencies to cater more cheaply.

Those who have been coming regularly to Switzerland, and who know the various resorts and hotels, can make their own arrangements just as cheaply as if they traveled with a party; but still there are a good many people who prefer to put themselves under the wing of an agency and travel with others.

As the majority of people can only get away from their business or professional occupations about Christmas time or the New Year, the hotels just then are usually crowded, and consequently the prices are higher than later on in the season. Therefore, those who can manage to take their Winter holidays at the end of January have the advantage not only of getting better terms from the hotels and also better accommodation, but are besides likely to fare better as regards weather conditions and have plenty of snow for skiing. The days, too, in February are longer and the weather as a rule more settled.

Those coming out for Winter sports to Switzerland should not fail to provide themselves with all their outfit before leaving England. Skates in particular should be of English make, and I believe that in Sheffield and Birmingham the best skates in the world are made. As for clothing, nothing can beat British goods, and these are about 50 per cent. cheaper in England than abroad. Boots for skating and skiing, for both men and women, should be bought in England. For skating, ordinary strong walking boots, in black calf or kid, with thick soles so that skates can be screwed on, answer the purpose.

If necessary, the skates can be unscrewed after the season is over and the screw holes easily filled up, so that the boots can be used for ordinary daily wear. Skiing boots must, however, be of special make, unless one is satisfied with an ordinary pair of climbing boots, which can be afterward used for mountaineering. Skis need not be brought from England, as they are easily obtainable in Switzerland at reasonable prices. The Swiss are now making excellent skis, which are just as good as the Norwegian makes.

A man's outfit should consist of a knickerbocker suit of warm material but with a smooth surface, so that the snow may not stick; a good pair of puttees, also of smooth material, and a woolen knitted helmet. He should also have a cardigan or sweater and two or three pairs of warm gloves, if possible one pair without fingers, only the thumb. For skating, an ordinary suit is quite suitable, though there are some skaters, usually experts, who wear special clothes for skating; but such fancy dresses should be left to the "skating professors." Those who go in for curling must provide themselves with india rubber snowshoes, as well as with extra heavy woolen stockings.

At the hotels in the evening the usual rule is to dress for dinner, and, as there is dancing in all resorts, evening-dress clothes must not be forgotten. Ladies naturally display their best frocks on such occasions, and at least once a week a fancy-dress ball is organized in the big hotels.

As for ladies' sports outfits, the time has gone when ladies wore short skirts and puttees for skiing. In Winter sports centres now it is as strange to see a lady in a short skirt and puttees for skiing as it is to see one in a long skirt in town. All women and girls now wear either knickers or Indian riding trousers, with jackets to match, or woolen cardigans or pullovers. For skating, however, a pleated skirt, either of wool or artificial silk, is more suitable and becoming.

COAST RUM-RUNNERS HAD TELEGRAPH CODE

Canadian Witness Reveals How Words Were Used in Deals With British Columbia Exporters.

VANCOUVER, B. C., Dec. 18 (AP).—Fragments of a bootleggers' telegraphic code, used by British Columbia liquor exporters in dealing with persons in the United States, entered the records of the Royal Commission investigating customs law violations here today.

The elusive memory of witnesses left the code incomplete, however, and meanings of "quack" and "pale parson" in the vernacular of the run-running fraternity remained unsolved.

Archie M. Thompson, shipping clerk for the Manitoba Refineries of British Columbia, testifying before the commission, told how he had sent code messages signed "John" to James Cameron in San Francisco and Los Angeles in connection with the exchange of bank drafts for cargoes of liquor.

"John" in alcoholic patois meant "shipper," Thompson asserted. "James Cameron" was a generic term for a receiver. It usually referred to Sydney Smith, although Tom Fay, under indictment in the United States on rum-running conspiracy charges, also responded to that title. Fay, previous testimony heard by the commission indicated, was a California agent of the Vancouver liquor exporters.

Thompson's memory failed him when meanings of many code words were sought, and his halting testimony was shut off by a remark by the Chairman of the commission that enough time had been spent on the witness.

R. L. Calder, Government counsel, recommended that the investigating commission go on record before the British Columbia Attorney General as favoring prosecution for perjury of four witnesses who have appeared during the series of hearings here and at Victoria.

DESIGNATE HOTELS AS ALUMNI CENTRES

Eighty Associations Cooperate in Movement to Make Official Headquarters at Leading Hostelries.

Eighty college and university alumni associations of America have cooperated to establish intercollegiate alumni hotels in some forty outstanding centres of America. At these hotels will be found everything planned for the convenience and the comfort of the college man. Here an alumnus of each of these colleges will find on file his own alumni magazine and a list of his own college alumni living in the immediate locality served by the hotel.

In California, where the plan has been in operation for three years, it has been found to be eminently successful. The intercollegiate alumni hotel idea came into being from a very definite need. The growth of travel by automobile combined with the growth in numbers of university and college men has brought to light the necessity for some place to which the visiting alumnus may go when in a strange city to find the names and addresses of his fellow-alumni living in the community.

In no way does the establishment of an alumni hotel headquarters in the local centres interfere with the local university club. The university club is exclusive in its membership; the intercollegiate alumni hotel is non-exclusive. It forms headquarters for the transient, the man who is in and out of town, and for the man who is in town for only a few hours.

Many eminent university leaders have followed the growth of the hotel headquarters movement in the Far West. President Ray Lyman Wilbur of Stanford University says:

"We have found by experience that by having an outstanding hotel in a local community act as a depository for names and addresses of local alumni and as general headquarters for our association activities, the morale of our alumni association has been greatly strengthened."

Again Robert G. Sproul, Vice President in charge of public relations at the University of California, speaks for his university as follows:

"Our alumni association in California has grown from four thousand to about fifteen thousand members in three years. We feel that the address lists of local alumni maintained at local hotel centres have aided much in strengthening acquaintanceship and forwarding a high type of university spirit among our alumni."

For over a year a large committee representing eighty college and university alumni associations has been working to make this national movement possible.

The American Continent has been traveled back and forth by its representatives many times in order to have coordinated action in the establishment of intercollegiate alumni headquarters.

HE SCORNS TIPS.

City Hall Park "Newsboy" an Independent Business Man.

The "newsboy" was past middle-age and he had a wooden leg, a peg leg of the kind that "Long John Silver" wore. He pivoted about on it and looked around him challengingly as he offered his newspapers for sale with an attitude of: "Take them or leave them—and may the devil take you!"

A man popped out of 41 Park Row and strode briskly across the street to City Hall Park, where the newsdealer stumped about.

"The 'Zephyr,'" the customer commanded, and it was handed to him. He gave a nickel and started to walk away.

"Here, wait a minute," the newsdealer called after him. The office man turned, a little surprised.

"You forgot your change."

With a wave of the hand the customer dismissed that, "Oh, never mind, never mind; that's all right." He turned again.

"No, it's not all right." The newsdealer spoke fiercely and caught the other by the arm.

"It's not all right. I'm in business and I earn what I get, and I don't have to take change from nobody."

The customer at first was a little embarrassed and then became annoyed.

"Very well, then," he said and took the two pennies.

"You bet!" said the newsdealer, grinning. "Now you got the idea."

With his head up at a cocky angle he stumped off highly pleased with himself. He looked as if he felt like throwing the rest of his newspapers at the head of Civic Virtue and telling everybody to go hang; he didn't have to take anything from anybody.

LATEST DEALINGS IN REAL ESTATE

NEW-LAW HOUSES SOLD ON EAST SIDE

Raynes Realty Corporation Buys Three Six-Story Flats on Fifty-fifth Street.

DEAL BY THOMAS WARD

Operator Acquires Apartments on Eightieth Street—Trading in the Bronx.

The Raynes Realty Corporation purchased from the Lucky Realty Company, Inc., the three six-story new-law apartment houses at 331 to 343 East Fifty-fifth Street, on a plottage of 125 by 100 feet, consisting of nine stores and three, four and five room apartments, having an aggregate rental of $37,000. It was held for $290,000. Irving Hutter was the broker in the transaction.

Wood, Dolson Co., Inc., sold two five-story walk-up apartment houses at 210-212 West Eightieth Street, between Broadway and Amsterdam Avenue, on a plot 50 by 100 feet, to Thomas Ward. The seller of 210 West Eightieth Street was the Regan Realty Company and the seller of 212 West Eightieth Street was Mary E. Flannery. Thomas Ward and his brother, Joseph Ward, have been active in the purchase of property on the west side during the last several years, and now have extensive holdings on the upper west side.

Lowenfeld & Luxenberg and Oscar Fradus sold for Jacob Schmidt of Weisbaden, Germany, represented in this country by the Irving Bank-Columbia Trust Company, to Sol Friedus, operator, the two four-story flats on the east side of Third Avenue, between Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Streets, and known as 711-13 Third Avenue. These buildings are built on a plot 37 by 80 feet and contain two stores on the ground floor and eight tenants on the upper floors. Mr. Friedus recently acquired 200-204 East Forty-fifth Street and 715-17-19 Third Avenue, and now controls a plot of 100 by 105 feet, which is at the southeast corner of Third Avenue and Forty-fifth Street.

The two five-story tenement houses at 218 and 220 West Sixty-seventh Street, on a plot 50 by 100 feet, were sold by Max Stern through Theodore Ortmann. This was the first sale of the property in twenty-five years.

Greenwich Realty Company sold for Lena Binder the three-story-and-basement brownstone building at 53 Charles Street to an investor. The new owner has contracted for alteration of the front and extensive renovation.

Trading in the Bronx.

In the Bronx, the Live Wire Realty Company sold for the Ambassador Holding Corporation to a Bronx operator the northwest corner of Valentine Avenue and 198th Street, 128 by 105 feet, a six-story corner apartment house with eight stores.

J. Clarence Davies, Inc., in conjunction with Colletti & Ennis, sold for Louis A. Lehmaier to Rusol Realties, Inc., the vacant plot 123 by 100 feet at the southwest corner of University Avenue and 167th Street. This is the first sale of the property in twenty-seven years.

D. Houlihan's Sons sold for the Benab Realty Company the northwest corner of 238th Street and White Plains Avenue, improved with stores, to an investor.

E. Fellman sold for Otto Gentsch the northeast corner of Noble and Ludlow Avenues, 100 by 100 feet, to Peter Arcaro, and a lot next door on Noble Avenue to D. De Nigris.

L. Gadikian sold 2,260, 2,262 and 2,264 Webster Avenue for the J. Berry Construction Company, Inc., to three different clients, each to take title of one parcel for his own use for business and dwelling.

West Side Dwelling Sold.

The three-story residence at 122 West Seventy-third Street on a lot 17 by 100 feet was sold by Blakely & Co. for A. Moore to John F. Berrell for occupancy.

Realty Associates Sell Lots.

Realty Associates reported yesterday the sale of nine lots in its Freeport-Merrick Estates to John P. Doty. These lots are situated on the southerly side of Oak Street, between Central Parkway and the Hempstead and Babylon turnpike. Mr. Doty is planning to erect three one-family frame dwelling houses.

Dairy Company Buys Site For Plant in Elizabeth, N. J

The property at 953-67 West Grand Street, Elizabeth, N. J., having a frontage of 200 feet with a depth of about 200 feet to the main line tracks of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, has just been sold through Feist & Feist, Inc., to the Alderney Dairy Company of Newark. This property is bounded on the west by the Jerry O'Mahoney plant, and on the east by the Kelly Press. The plot in question was acquired through two ownerships, the most westerly parcel covering about 50 feet front with a depth of 200 feet, being formerly owned by George E. Banbury and Alonso P. Burnett, and the most easterly portion, covering about 147 feet front with a depth of 200 feet, by Peter J. Olde, Elizabeth attorney.

The property will be improved in the near future by the Alderney Dairy Company, which will erect a modern one-story building to be used for distribution and service.

$350,000 FLAT SOLD ON THE PARK SLOPE

James M. McCunn Is Purchaser of Brooklyn House—Tilden Court Deal.

Frank A. Slocum, as broker, has closed contracts for the sale of the apartment house at 125 Prospect Park West, corner of Eighth Street, Brooklyn, containing thirty-six apartments, facing Prospect Park West, to James M. McCunn.

The property was sold by Davidson & Schachter. The reported price was $350,000.

John Ansbro sold the Tilden Court Apartments at 8,302 to 8,312 Sixth Avenue for L. Kushner & Sons to Dennis J. Murphy. The building consists of thirty-nine apartments and is one of the many multi-family modern apartment houses recently erected in Bay Ridge. The property was held at $225,000.

The same brokers sold the seventeen-family apartment at 4,916 Sixth Avenue for D. Costello to a client for investment, and the six-family house at 365 Eighty-sixth Street for Joseph Donadio to a client for investment.

The Frank M. McCurdy Company, Inc., sold the northwest corner of Foster Avenue and East Eighteenth Street for the Mansfield Improvement Corporation to a client.

TO OPEN THE MURRAY JAN. 1.

Butler & Baldwin Announce Date for Opening Park Av. Apartment.

Butler & Baldwin, Inc., agents, have announced the formal opening, Jan. 1, of The Murray, 66 Park Avenue, at the corner of Thirty-eighth Street.

One of the most important leases made is that of the pent house for a number of years to Dudley Field Malone, prominent lawyer.

This modern Colonial fifteen-story apartment house has furnished and unfurnished suites for long or short term leases. It also has restaurant service.

The resident manager, Thomas Bridger, was formerly with the Lucerne and Ambassador hotels in Atlantic City.

New Firm of Architects.

The firm of architects long known as McKenzie, Voorhees & Gmelin has dissolved due to the recent death of the senior member, Andrew C. McKenzie. The formation of a new firm to succeed the old has been formally announced as Voorhees, Gmelin & Walker. This new firm will continue a practice founded about forty-four years ago by Cyrus L. W. Eidlitz, who carried on until 1902, when a new firm, Eidlitz & McKenzie, was formed. This firm existed until 1910 and since as McKenzie, Voorhees & Gmelin. Ralph Walker, the new partner, has been connected with the firm for a number of years.

MANY LEASES MADE IN MIDTOWN SECTION

Strong Demand Is Apparent for Office and Showroom Space on the Avenues.

Rose; in 232 Madison Avenue to Literary Commodities, Inc.; in the Bryant Park Building, 55 West Forty-second Street, to William O. Delin and Fred R. Coyle; in 119 West Fifty-seventh Street to the National School of Interior Decoration, Inc.

Brown, Wheelock: Harris, Vought & Co. leased space in 15 West Thirty-seventh Street to Fred Pavel & Co., Louis D. Calante & Co., Sol Goodman Company, Inc., and Joseph and Henry Warshaw; and, in conjunction with Pease & Elliman, space in the Pennsylvania Building, 225 West Thirty-fourth Street, to H. A. Caesar & Co.; in 1 Park Avenue to the Michigan Seating Company and F. Derby & Co.; at 95 Madison Avenue to Jaque Realty Holding Company; at 62 West Thirty-sixth Street to David Jankowitz.

Cushman & Wakefield, Inc., leased for the Anahma Realty Corporation space in the Marlin-Rockwell Building, 366 Madison Avenue, to 785 Madison Avenue, Inc.; for the 489 Fifth Avenue Corporation offices in the Wallach Building, 489 Fifth Avenue, to James I. Taylor; for 551 Fifth Avenue, Inc., offices in the new French Building now nearing completion at 551 Fifth Avenue to Warren Charles Klein, and offices in the Canadian Pacific Building, 342 Madison Avenue, to the Penn Fibreboard Corporation.

Blake & Warren Company, Inc., leased for Fred Reis a floor at 43 and 45 East Nineteenth Street to Kunst & Small Company; for Annin & Co. an entire floor at 85 Fifth Avenue to Richman, Newburger & Travers, and for the Spingler-Van Buren Estate a floor at 17 and 19 Union Square to the Bluebird Clothing Company.

WINTER CONSTRUCTION HELPS REALTY MARKET

Trading in Brooklyn Properties Reflects Year-Around Building Activity.

Unabated construction activities in the building field during the Winter months has been a dominant factor in eliminating seasonal slack periods in the Brooklyn real estate market, according to John F. James, President of the Kings County Real Estate Corporation, who points out that Brooklyn's greatest building program is now reaching its peak in the midst of the year's most rigorous weather conditions.

"Today, a survey of the field shows that Brooklyn's tallest office building, three new theatres, a score of pretentious apartments and many other large scale operations are in the midst of construction work, which is being carried on in scheduled time," Mr. James said. "Building figures actually show an increase during the past fortnight in plans filed for other construction."

Mr. James contrasted the present-day situation with that of ten years past, when the entire building field considered the Winter months as an "off" season, and decreased their development work to a minimum. He said: "Builders in the past waited until a demand arose and then feverishly started construction work to meet the buying market. Present-day builders interpret the market and prepare to meet it. This is an especially noteworthy phase of the Brooklyn market, which has been startlingly lacking in proper accommodations when needed. A similar readjustment has taken place among the brokers and operators of Brooklyn. They have become aware that the Winter market is one of the most substantial of the year. Not only have they discovered it is the favored season for influx of new residents, but also is the period when business and industrial activities reach their highest peak, and consequently call for greater expansion.

"It must be remembered that underlying this strengthened market is a much more vigorous and consistent field of supply than was existent ten years ago. Prior to the World War, Brooklyn's real estate activities fluctuated sharply and it was not until 1921 that the increase in building and turn-over reached the substantial steadiness which has been evinced since that time.

"A steady demand has made a steady market, and a chart showing the real estate expansion of Brooklyn today will bring out clearly that the constantly upward trend is strikingly free of counteracting decreases. Close observers of building figures throughout the country have noted during the past year that Brooklyn's building program has climbed more surely, month by month, than of any other metropolis in the United States."

BRONX PLANS FILED.

Bronxdale Avenue, east side, 325.38 feet south of Van Nest Avenue, one-story brick factory, 35 by 160 feet. R. Monti & Son, owners; Highbridge Architect Company, architect; cost, $20,000.

Wilder Avenue, east side, 301.23 feet north of Nereid Avenue, three-story brick dwelling, 21 by 54 feet; garage 18 by 20 feet. Andrew Camiutos, owner; Charles S. Clark, architect; cost, $11,000.

Boyd Avenue, west side, 225 feet north of Edenwald Avenue, two two-story frame dwellings, 16 by 44 feet. Florance Kelley, owner and architect; cost, $10,000.

TRADING IN BROOKLYN.

Ten Three-Story Flats for Avenue U Blockfront.

The block front on the north side of Avenue U, between East Eighth and East Ninth Streets, has been sold to the Parkley Realty Corporation, who will erect ten three-story brick stores and apartments. Green & Co. were the brokers.

Sullivan & O'Connor sold the plot, 40 by 100 feet, on the south side of Ninety-sixth Street, about 362 feet west of Fourth Avenue, for David Joyce to a client.

An investing client of the Bulkley & Horton Company purchased through the Multiple Listing Bureau the four-story cold-water apartment, on a lot 20 by 120, irregular, at 2,538 Church Avenue, from Hans Sorensen.

SEES REAL ESTATE HISTORY IN DECISION

Many Sections to Benefit From Restrictive Covenants Case, J. C. Forster Says.

FINDS CLAUSES A BURDEN

Restrictions Formerly Made in Good Faith Now a Hindrance, He Declares.

John C. Forster, President of the Eighth Avenue Association, cites a recent decision of the Court of Appeals on restrictive covenants and expresses the opinion that the decision can be made to play a most important part in the future development of neighborhoods that have been retarded because of the existence of restrictive clauses. Many of the covenants were executed in good faith, Mr. Forster said, but have since become a burden because of the changing character of the neighborhood.

Quoting from the decision, Mr. Forster said:

"The Court of Appeals, by a recent unanimous decision, in which is reversed a judgment of the Appellate Division, has made real estate history which will have a most important bearing on the activities of civic bodies and others interested in the development of different neighborhoods in New York, such as the Eighth Avenue section. The case in question is that of Forstman vs. Joray Holding Company and Edward R. Finch.

"The trial court in special term sustained the contention of the defendants, namely, that the character of the neighborhood had in the period between 1907 and 1924 radically changed from a residence to a business district, thereby voiding the restrictive covenant which had existed and which prevented the construction of a business building on the property in question. The Appellate Division, by a split vote, reversed this decision, made new findings and directed a judgment for the plaintiff. It was this decision which was reversed by the Court of Appeals.

"The property in question is situated on the northwest corner of Madison Avenue and Seventieth Street, this city. It is evident, however, that this decision can be used effectively in other districts in which the development has been retarded by similar restrictive covenants.

"The covenant on which the suit was instituted is as follows:

"'The said party hereto of the second part, for him (her) self, his (her) heirs and assigns, hereby covenants and agrees to and with the said party of the first part, its successors or assigns, that neither he (she) nor his (her) heirs or assigns shall or will at any time prior to the first of January, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine (1929), erect or permit upon the above granted premises or any part thereof any building except a dwelling house for a single family, and further, that neither he (she) nor his (her) heirs or assigns shall or will at any time prior to the said first day of January, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine (1929), erect or permit upon the above granted premises any such building, or any other structure, or any extension thereof, or projection therefrom (except partition walls or fences not exceeding twelve feet in height) within ten feet of a vertical line passing through the centre line of the block between Seventieth and Seventy-first Streets.

"'These covenants shall be deemed covenants running with the land and binding upon the future owners thereof, but shall expire and terminate by limitation on the first day of January, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine (1929).'

"The action was brought to obtain a mandatory injunction requiring the defendants to remove a two-story business building. The building was erected after July 1, 1924, when the premises were leased by the defendant, Judge Finch, to the defendant Holding Company. The restrictive covenant, under which the plaintiff proceeded with his action, was contained in a prior deed conveying the premises and subject to which Judge Finch took title.

"In its decision the Court of Appeals definitely takes into consideration the fact that the district has changed from a private residential neighborhood to a business district. The Court then states the factors which control the disposition of the case, as follows:

"(1) The life of the covenant has nearly expired and the enforcement of it cannot restore the neighborhood to its former condition by making it desirable for private residences.

"(2) The block has no special advantages for residence purposes which would offset the encroachments of business thereon.

"(3) The value of defendants' property for residence purposes is relatively small. It is in a business district and either it must be used for business purposes or it must remain idle until the expiration of the restrictive covenant.

"(4) The destruction of the defendants' building or the denial of their right to erect such a building would inflict a loss on defendants and would neither add to the value of plaintiff's property nor make their building more desirable for residence purposes. We hold that with law and the facts, and in the exercise of a sound discretion, it would be inequitable to grant the injunctive relief given below in the case for the reason that it would bear heavily on the defendants without benefiting the plaintiff."

GERMANY ISSUES PORTRAIT STAMPS

Complete Sets of First Series of This Kind Received Here —Famous Men Depicted.

SOCIALISTS OPPOSED ACTION

Saw Fostering of Monarchy in Use of Frederick the Great's Likeness —High Prices at an Auction.

Complete sets of the new German stamps have just been received by New York City dealers. They have aroused considerable interest among collectors, as it is the first time Germany has authorized a portrait series. The portrait of Frederick the Great on the stamps caused a loud protest from the Socialist element in Germany. The Cabinet and the Minister of Posts were accused of fostering monarchical principles and a demand was made for withdrawal of the set. The Minister of Posts replied that this was impossible, as a large number had already been printed. He also explained that the honor paid to Frederick the Great was not because he was a great soldier, but because he was a greater statesman.

The portrait of Frederick appears on the 10-pfennig stamp, which is most commonly used for local postage.

The new series contains ten stamps with nine portraits of eminent Germans, most of whom were famous in literature, philosophy and music. Goethe is the only one appearing on two denominations, the 3 and the 25 pfennig. The 25-pfennig was a later addition. It is the first time that Germany has issued a stamp of that value, but it was done to provide a single stamp to pay the postal rate on letters from Germany to a foreign country.

Two of the portraits are musicians—Beethoven and Bach. The others are Schiller, Kant, Lessing, Leibnitz and Albrecht Durer, who is best known for his wood engravings.

With the exception of group portraits in miniature, in which the ex-Kaiser appears on the 3 and 5 mark stamps prior to the war, and the memorial stamp to Heinrich von Stephan in honor of his work in creating the Universal Postal Union, brought out about two years ago, no portrait stamp has ever been issued by Germany.

High prices were paid last week at the auction sale of United States stamps from the William Wolters collection of Honolulu. They were sold by J. C. Morgenthau at the Collectors' Club, 51 East Forty-eighth Street. One of the best stamps in the collection was a fine copy of the scarce Baltimore postmaster 5-cent, 1845, on the original envelope with a fine Baltimore cancellation in blue. It brought $760. The unusual price of $300 was paid for an uncancelled block of six of the 6-cent, 1870, without grill, printed by the National Bank Note Company. Single copies have a catalogue value of $12.

The upper diagonal half of a 12-cent stamp, 1851 issue, used for 6-cent postage on an envelope from San Francisco to Boston, sold for $205, and $184 was paid for a fine copy of the 5-cent, red brown, 1851, on the original envelope sent from New Orleans to France. The Hawaiian stamps of the Wolters collection will be sold by Mr. Morgenthau on Jan. 11 and 12. Among them are seven copies of the rare "missionary" 1851 issue, two of the 5-cent variety and five of the 13-cent.

A choice lot of early United States stamps, many on the original envelopes, will be sold by J. Murray Bartels at 116 Nassau Street, Jan. 5 and 6, and on Jan. 14 and 15 Percy G. Doane will sell a mixed collection of United States and foreign stamps at 154 Nassau Street.

Herman Toaspern was the exhibiting guest at the Collectors' Club last Wednesday night, showing a fine lot of early Heligoland issues. The next meeting will be Jan. 5, when Ferrars S. Tows will show his collection of stamps from Hayti.

AUTO DRIVERS' EYES WILL RECEIVE TEST

Commissioner Harnett Orders Examination of Applicants After Jan. 15.

URGES PURCHASE OF PLATES

He Says Prompt Action Will Do Away With Congestion on Last Days of Year.

All new applicants for licenses to drive automobiles in New York State on and after Jan. 15 will be required to pass an eye test. In making this announcement yesterday Charles A. Harnett, Motor Vehicle Commissioner, said that the decision to require an eye examination was part of the safety program drawn up by the Motor Vehicle Bureau in its effort to reduce the increasing number of accidents during the coming year.

The necessity for additional safety measures was stressed by Commissioner Harnett, in view of the fact that the latest official figures for motor vehicle fatalities in New York City during the last eleven months show that 980 persons were killed, which exceeds by forty the entire motor vehicle fatality list for the entire year of 1925. The present year, therefore, will probably have more than 1,000 deaths, the highest record.

"The eyesight of each applicant," said Mr. Harnett, "will be examined by a motor vehicle inspector previous to the driving test, which has been required for several years. If the examination reveals defective vision the inspector will suggest methods to correct the defect, and then, if the applicant can pass the test, with or without eyeglasses, and also the driving test, the license will be issued."

The method of the test, which will be as simple as possible, has been prepared by Leo Mayer, optometric inspector in the State Department of Education.

In issuing this announcement Commissioner Harnett said that no inspector or employe of the bureau will be permitted to advise the applicant to visit any particular optician or organization for the proper adjustment of any defect which may be discovered. Any member of the Motor Vehicle Bureau making such a suggestion will be dismissed.

The eye test is now required in several States. Many safety experts have urged that an eye test be adopted as a uniform rule by all States.

With only two more weeks for motor car owners to obtain their 1927 registration plates if they wish to drive their cars on Jan. 1 without an infraction of the Motor Vehicle law, Commissioner Harnett urges the necessity of prompt applications this week in order to avoid congestion and irritating delays on the closing days of the year.

For the benefit of motorists in the downtown business district a branch office has been established on the second floor of the Municipal Building. At Fulton and Gold Streets the New York Automobile Club has opened a branch office. Other Manhattan offices have been opened at 67 Fourth Avenue, corner of Ninth Street, and also in the Saks' store at Fifth Avenue and Fiftieth Street. Wanamaker's, Bloomingdale's and Koch's in the Bronx.

In addition to the main offices at 154 West Fortieth Street and 40 Myrtle Avenue, Brooklyn, plates may be obtained at forty branch offices in the five boroughs.

CITY RENTS SPACE FOR CARS

Berlin Will Make Money Out of Parked Automobiles.

BERLIN, Dec. 18 (AP).—The City Council has decided to make money out of the parking of automobiles on public streets and squares. Fifty parking spaces are to be set aside.

The cars will be guarded by watchmen of a private detective agency. A charge of 7 cents an hour, or 35 cents a day, is suggested. The city is to get 42 per cent. of the gross earnings.

IN PARIS
You would learn French this way!

At last it has been brought to America! Europe's own method of learning to speak French—the very same method that you would be taught in Paris or any of the other great capitals abroad. Now in your own home you can learn this most charming of languages as Europeans learn it.

Hugo's "French at Sight"

Ask any educated foreigner about the Hugo method. He will tell you that the great house of Hugo is known throughout Europe—that it is the leading publisher of language text books—that it conducts language institutes in the great centers which are recognized as headquarters for linguistic instruction.

And now a special edition of Hugo's famous course in French has been prepared for America. And to introduce it, a liberal offer has been arranged that you simply cannot afford to miss.

First, you are invited to examine the complete Hugo course in "French at Sight" entirely FREE. Then, after you have seen how easy and fascinating it is, how it actually enables you to start speaking French from the first lesson, you can own the course for a very trifling sum—the barest fraction of what you would expect to pay for a complete course in French.

Speak French as the French Speak It!

Hugo's "French at Sight" is entirely unlike ordinary systems of instruction. No tedious rules of grammar—no terrifying lists of irregular verbs. No! In the Hugo course you learn to speak French. You start at once with easy sentences—just the expressions you would use if you were travelling in France. So many people think it difficult to learn French. But here you are actually speaking French within an hour!

FREE—Imported French Dictionary

To add still more to this really sensational offer, a most practical and authoritative Dictionary is included FREE with the Hugo Course. It is the 1926 edition of the famous Cestre-Guibillon Dictionary, French-English and English-French. 623 pages—50,000 words—beautifully bound in deep green seal grain.

Mail only the Coupon—At Once!

No cost—no obligation. Just your name and address on the coupon below will bring you the complete Hugo French Course for five days' inspection—twenty-four lessons, bound in twelve portfolios. And the FREE Dictionary!

See how simple and interesting the lessons are. Then, at your own inclination, either return the course or send a first payment of only $2 and pay $2 a month thereafter until you have paid a total of $12. Yes, that is ALL you pay for the complete Hugo Course. A bargain, if ever there was one!

But no money now—just the coupon.

The Coupon Brings the Course for 5 days Trial

CHRIST AS THE MAN OF GENIUS

Mr. Murry Concludes That Jesus Predetermined His Own Death

JESUS, MAN OF GENIUS. By J. Middleton Murry. 273 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $3.50.

JESUS: A Myth. By Georg Brandes. Translated from the Danish by Edwin Bjorkman. 170 pp. New York: Albert & Charles Boni.

By P. W. WILSON

IT cannot be merely as a critic that, on this day of the year, we consider the latest rendering of a transcendent theme which we owe to what we may call the devout heterodoxy of a great authority on literature. Mr. Middleton Murry, editor of the Athenaeum in London. In the vast library dedicated to the character and career of Jesus, we must try to place this arresting book where truly it belongs.

If some of his theses are strange, we must bear in mind that they are wrung from him by the grip of a deadlock. Faith, Catholic and Protestant, accepted the Christ of Scripture, seeking not to explain the inexplicable, but "lost in wonder, love and praise." Doubts then arose. Questions were asked. And the Christ was obscured.

Indeed, there arose the rationalists, who pressed the perplexity to a logical conclusion and argued that Jesus never existed at all. To M. Brandes, here translated, and others who discuss that proposition, we will suggest that theirs is no new dialectic. Even the radicals of theology do not always realize that Modernism may be merely antiquity dressed, not in a toga, but in trousers—the old, old story of little minds in a muddle over infinities. Denying the existence of Christ is what the Gnostics did eighteen hundred years ago. And when, one hundred years ago, the Whigs talked that way at Holland House, they also deemed themselves to be not less superior to the orthodox in intellect.

Of the late Bishop Magee it was said that his sermons made things so simple that there must be a catch somewhere. M. Brandes is also clear as Euclid. But is it the clarity of knowledge? "It is no more imaginable," says he, "that the British Viceregent of India"—surely the translator, Edwin Bjorkman, should have been acquainted with the term Viceroy!—"should sentence a Hindu to death for expressing heterodox opinions about the teachings of Buddha than it is that a Roman procurator should interfere on account of an accusation" that Jesus threatened to destroy the Temple.

M. Brandes should read up his India. During the mutiny men who, on religious grounds, objected to biting cartridges containing animal fat were blown from the guns. At this moment the Government has constantly to defend Indian temples against Moslems and Moslem mosques against Hindus. And the use of Sikh temples, where reformers were quarreling with themselves, has had to be regulated by military measures. Where religious issues appear to be menacing civil order, which was the case put to Pilate, the most secular administration takes notice. The analogy thus advanced by M. Brandes, therefore, will be entirely convincing, provided always that an ignorance of India is sufficiently complete. But even a little knowledge of India will be, we fear, a dangerous thing for his hypothesis.

For troubled exegesis, the theory that there was no Christ at all seemed to offer a blessed Nirvana in which all the contradictions and impossibilities of the Gospels could be merged in a soothing oblivion. Unfortunately, the simplicity of nihilism left one question to be answered. It was not the clergy who worried about it. Perhaps they were too stupid. Perhaps they had a better use for their time. But there were thinkers of leisure, unencumbered by parishes, who pursued that psychology which has become the most fashionable of all the inexact sciences. And psychology has examined the abolition of Jesus.

Let us suppose that the Christ was a delusion. Even delusion is a phenomenon. Even delusion has to be explained. There must have been some mental process by which the delusion was evolved.

To some students, Christ was the product of Egyptian idolatry, Isis and Osiris and the rest, with ingredients from India and Persia. But the intellect of our race at its highest efficiency, including the mind of the psychologist, has not been prepared to stand sponsor for an invented Jesus. That some Jesus lived and died on this planet is today taken for granted.

It is at this interesting point of the story that there enters, with others, a thinker like Mr. Middleton Murry. The task, so he tells us, is to re-create the Christ. And this is a task that fascinates, not clergy alone, but the most brilliant laymen of our generation. We see statues of Jesus by Epstein and Kalisch. We see films of Jesus. We read books about Jesus. One day Mrs. Austin describes Him as "a small-town man." Another day Mr. Bruce Barton, whose keen ear catches that laughter of Jesus which was unheard by His mere apostles, tells us that the man whom every one knew in Nazareth is the man whom nobody knows in New York. Mr. Middleton Murry himself only writes of Jesus because it was no longer possible for him to refrain. The faith which began with four evangelists is now served by forty times four thousand, so great is the cloud of witnesses who encompass us. Indeed, the re-created Christs would fill a pantheon.

Via Dolorosa, Jerusalem.

From a Painting by Dean Cornwell for "The City of the Great King," by William Lyon Phelps. (Cosmopolitan Book Corporation.)

One feature of the Christs so re-created is that they are sharply diverse, the one from the other. Mr. Bruce Barton's Jesus is a Rotarian among Rotarians. Mr. Middleton Murry's Jesus is a mystic, alone in a crowd. The one preserves a silence which would have been rudely broken by the hilarity of the other. We must dismiss the hope, then, that, in the labor of producing a Christ that shall be visible to the world today, there is as yet any unanimity.

But if we superimpose the portraits one on the other and arrive at a composite picture we find that the blurred outlines present a face, evidently alternative to and not identical with the countenance which shines through the Gospels. The Christ thus re-created is not the Christ that churches have worshiped and is not the Christ that will evoke such worship in years to come. We may be interested in and curious about the alternative Christs. We may compare them and discuss them. But pray to them, seek salvation from them, confess sins to them—all that is unthinkable. It would be as reasonable to deify Metternich or Mozart.

What lends such peculiar interest to Mr. Middleton Murry's book is the fact that he is a writer and a judge of writing in others. He knows, therefore, that in all writing there is no inspiration unless it be literal inspiration. What a line is to the artist, that is a phrase to the author. Like tone in music, it must be inerrant or an error, and between the two there is no compromise. If a violin be out of tune it is no palliative of the discord to plead that the environment included ukuleles.

Hence Mr. Middleton Murry begins by cutting the canon of his Scripture to the texts on which he can rely. His selection is none the less interesting because it depends on no authority save his own. As we read his very lucid exposition we are to accept the prophecies of the psalmists who foretold Jesus. Here Mr. Middleton Murry sits among the Fundamentalists. Yet having approved the prophets, he eliminates wholly the narrator of the birth and youth of Jesus and insists on a Christ without Christmas. He accepts a miracle so physical as the healing of a leper and then treats it as a kind of offense by Jesus against his own ethics. He dismisses a bodily resurrection, yet is sure that Jesus appeared in a body to St. Peter and St. Paul. In all this he has been influenced, we take it, by Mr. Shaw's Joan of Arc—by religion as an illusion to be dramatized.

It was, if we remember aright, a Catholic Cardinal—was it not Manning?—who was asked what he thought of a high mass in the Anglican Church and replied that he preferred the ceremonial simplicity of Rome. Mr. Middleton Murry's characterization of the Christ as a man of genius has sometimes led us, we confess, to long for the elemental axioms attributed to St. Athanasius, St. Thomas Aquinas and the pre-Millenarians.

When we cut the canon of Scripture, we secure a certain elbow room for speculation. Mr. Middleton Murry's mind is here at once active and original. And as he tells us, he owes little to the researches of the acknowledged scholars. He announces, with an assurance, quite positive, that Jesus was a youngest, not an eldest son. He was born at Nazareth, not Bethlehem. He was hopelessly estranged from his family. His mother never went near the cross. He never asked John to take care of her. Mary of Bethany was Mary Magdala Lazarus, her brother was Lazarus in the parable, whose sores were licked by the dogs. And there are other biographical surprises which indicate that a re-created Christ may be, in some respects, a triumph of sheer improvisation.

Here we confess that we do not wholly appreciate the author's position. Every century has, of (Continued on Page 25)

Looking Towards the Future From a Study of the Past

Lewis Mumford's Illuminating Review of America's Cultural Heritage and Development

THE GOLDEN DAY—A STUDY IN AMERICAN EXPERIENCE AND CULTURE. By Lewis Mumford. 283 pp. New York: Boni & Liveright. $2.50

By J. BROOKS ATKINSON

TO report that Mr. Mumford has written a book of genuine importance is perhaps to imply that it is dull. 'Studies in American Experience and Culture' usually wear that dark and forbidding mantle and are shod in the clumsy bootery of footnotes. Considering the entire range of American experience in 283 pages, Mr. Mumford obviously has gone to the dusty sources like any other scholar, but he gives us the result of his study rather than the study itself, and he writes a sharp, clean English with a beauty all its own. It conveys the freshness of Mr. Mumford's point of view. For he writes under the spell of a vision—of life rich, sweet and full: "We begin again," he says, "to dream Thoreau's dream—of what it means to live a whole human life." "Beneath the organized vivacity of our American communities," he writes in the last chapter, "who is not aware of a blankness, a sterility, a boredom, a despair?" While Mr. Mumford busies himself with the sources of American culture in the unsettlement of Europe, with the pioneer, with Emerson, Thoreau, Whitman and with the debauch of materialism following the Civil War, he keeps this vision of a full life before his reader's eyes; and if "The Golden Age" is generally disappointed with the philosophic representation of American life today Mr. Mumford does not despair. "Alions!" he cries in his last sentence, "the road is before us!"

What road? He is not accurate, so penetrating and so courageous—in a word, so brilliant—about the past that his vagueness about the future becomes all the more disheartening. For the first time he slumps into nebulous abstraction:

> The power to escape from this sinister world can come only by the double process of encountering more complete modes of life and of reformulating a more vital tissue of ideas and symbols to supplant those which have led us into the stereotyped interests and actions which we endeavor in vain to identify with a full human existence.

Or:

> Love is the type of desire in all its modes, and in the recent emergence of a handful of artists who by the force of their inner life have seen the essential and makeshift character of a large part of the daily routine, there is perhaps the prophecy of a new stream of tendency in American life.

Alas! Mr. Mumford begs the question of the future, as every one must. We can be certain only that the present era, with its stupendous prosperity, its bewildering activity and its tight organization, leaves us all restless and dissatisfied. The creative impulse has been squandered on the wrong horses; we need nothing more sorely today than the impetus of a concrete ideal.

"The Golden Day" of which Mr. Mumford is writing is the period of Emerson, Thoreau, Whitman, Hawthorne and Melville, when the values of life still had proportion, when poetry and philosophy still had vigor and sweetness and business was a means rather than the end of common living. In the Civil War, Mr. Mumford says, "the machine won, and the human spirit was almost as much paralyzed by the victory as it would have been by the defeat." Not that the machine is to be despised; rather that it must be regarded as a means. On the matter of values, of machines and industrialism in relation to beauty, Mr. Mumford writes in a later chapter:

> None of the fine minds of the Golden Day was afraid to welcome the new forces that were at large in the world. Need I recall that Whitman wrote an apostrophe to the locomotive, that Emerson said a steamship sailing promptly between American and Europe might be as beautiful as a star, and that Thoreau, who loved to hear the wind in the pine needles, listened with equal pleasure to the music of the telegraph wires?

That practical instrumentalities were to be worshiped never occurred to these writers; but that they added a new and significant element to our culture, which the poet was ready to absorb and include in his report upon the universe, was profoundly true.

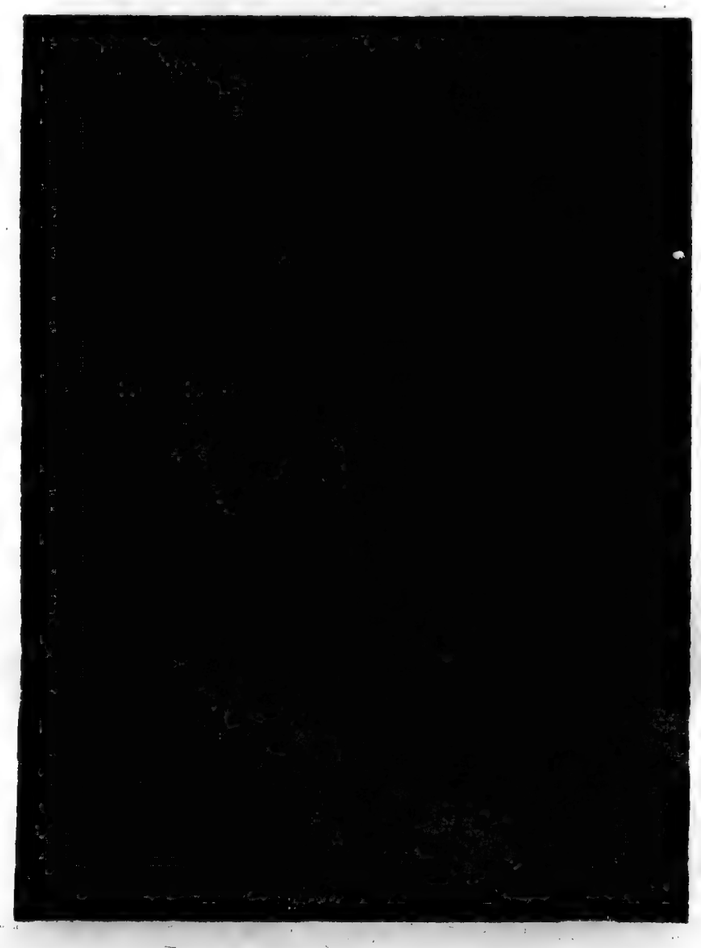
What Thoreau left behind is still precious; men may still go out and make over America in the image of Thoreau.

Mr. Mumford thinks clearly. The pleasure of his book is the radiance of his personality, the practical value is its composition of all the scattered elements of American life into a form by which the parts are related to the whole. Mr. Mumford begins by tracing the beginnings of American culture in the breakdown of culture in the Old World, the Protestant Reformation, the extended use of money to replace barter and service, and the dissolution of the old forms of government into democracy. "The American was thus a stripped European, and the colonization of America can, with justice, be called the dispersion of Europe." a movement carried on by people incapable of sharing or continuing the past." In discussing the pioneer Mr. Mumford shows how the romantic concept of the purity of nature and the deification of the savage as an unpolluted human turned into a wild ferocious pioneer who assaulted the wilderness and pushed on and on for the sake of motion.



"Third Avenue" From An Oil Painting by C. R. W. Nevinson

From "C. R. W. Nevinson," in the Contemporary British Artists Series (Charles Scribner's Sons).

What a conflict was in the pioneer's bosom! He pulls up stakes to the tune of "Home, Sweet Home." He sells his parcel of real estate to the next gambler who will hold it, still sighing "There is no place like home." He cuts out the forest: "Woodman, spare that tree; touch not a single bough; in youth it sheltered me, and I'll protect it now." And in the struggle of scalping one of the red varmints he is driving to the land of the sunset the song of "Hiawatha" slips from his hip pocket.

In the end the pioneer was as far from Rousseau and Wordsworth as the inventor of poison gas was from the troubadour who sang the "Song of Roland."

Mr. Mumford then begins to write lyrically of his "golden day"—of Emerson, who did not feel that our "civilization nears its meridian, but rather that we are yet only at the cock-crowing and the morning star," and who met the challenge of the American wilderness and the new American society. "Two men met the challenge and carried it further—Thoreau and Whitman." In his next graphic sentence Mr. Mumford expresses truly and beautifully the exact relationship between these three men: "They completed the Emersonian circle, carrying the potted flower of the scholar's study out into the Spring sunshine, the upturned earth and the keen air." Mr. Mumford often writes in that compact, vivid style.

That period, in this writer's estimation, was the most glamorous in our experience. "When the curtain rose on the post-bellum scene, this old America was for all practical purposes demolished; industrialism had entered overnight, had transformed the practices of agriculture, had encouraged a mad exploitation of mineral oil, natural gas and coal, and had made the unscrupulous master of finance, fat with war profits, the central figure of the situation." From the lustrous idealism of Emerson culture degenerated into "pragmatic acquiescence," into "idealizing the real" when, as one of the latter-day transcendentalists said, "The end is lost in the means, life is smothered in appliances." Transcendentalism "had resulted in headache," and imagination gave way to an obsequious intellectualism. Those who could not acquiesce to this new set of forces fled to Europe, like Henry James, and dug fruitlessly in the parchments of another culture. With vast accumulations of wealth the younger generation set out for foreign shores to buy the equivalent of what they could not get at home.

Turning away from nature, externalized and unassimilated, the new generation turned toward an equally foreign and externalized culture. The ugliness and worldliness of the contemporary urban scene could not be exaggerated; but they averted themselves from the scene itself, instead of confronting the forces that were producing it.

It would be enjoyable, and more convincing, to let Mr. Mumford make his own interpretations of Mrs. Jack Gardner's recrudescence of European art in her semi-public museum, of Henry Adams's stifled career, of Santayana's surrender to classicism, of the capture of "all the instrumentalities of the intellectual life" by industry, of middle-class novelists of muckraking, of the specious sociology of Jack London, of Theodore Dreiser's bewilderment, of John Dewey's championing of "utilitarianism." Mr. Mumford is firm but not unfair. His last paragraph in "Under the Shadow of the Muck-Rake" may indicate his cast of mind:

> Without vision, the pragmatists perish. And our generation, in particular, who had seen them fall back, one by one, into commercial affairs, into administrative absorption, into a pained abandonment of "reform," into taking whatever fortune thrusts into their laps, into an acquiescence even more pathetic, perhaps, than that of the disabled generation which followed the Civil War—our generation may well doubt the adequacy of their complainant philosophy. "Things are in the saddle," Emerson said, "and ride mankind." We must overthrow the rider before we can recover the horse; for, otherwise, horse and rider may drive to the devil.

What are the signs of today? What indications are there that the new generation will "see life whole, and seek a whole life?" Chiefly they are in destruction: in the impatience with stale rituals of living that underlies the brash writing about which we were all excited, even alarmed, five years ago. Now you cannot distinguish a radical from a conservative; they both wear sack suits, felt hats and neat ties. Perhaps we may regard this good feeling between both camps as an indication of the acceptance of universality as a common axiom. Or perhaps, worse thought, the radicals have lost their zeal. At any rate, satisfaction with the routine of the day betrays a lack of vision for the morrow. What plans are there, what hopes anywhere for tomorrow? "The road is before us!" Mr. Mumford exclaims. What road?

Mr. Lindsay Writes Some Indian Lyrics

THE CANDLE IN THE CABIN. A Weaving Together of Script and Singing. By Vachel Lindsay. 130 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.

VACHEL LINDSAY, the irrepressible, has again come forward with a book of his characteristic verses and pen drawings. This time the poems are based on Indian rhythms, chants and dances. Mr. Lindsay, as all of his readers know, has a fondness for the primitive; what is perhaps his best known poem, "The Congo," was in its song structure built on negro minstrelsy; and "Old, Old, Old Andrew Jackson" has behind it something of pioneer fiddling. In many of the poems of the volumes "Going to the Sun" and "Going to the Stars" there were hints of Indian lyricism, but the present collection, the title of which is "The Candle in the Cabin," is the first exclusively tracing to the music of the Redskin.

For those who are accustomed to think of Mr. Lindsay as ever given over to boisterousness, the muted tones of "The Candle in the Cabin" will sound as an anticlimax; and it must be admitted that one must make certain allowances in reading them. The poet, who undoubtedly is more intimately acquainted with Indian motifs than he can expect more than a few of his readers to be, has not explained the principles of the music to which he relates his lines and forms, and one is, unfortunately, left somewhat befogged. Simplicity thrice simplified appears to be the fundamental characteristic, with an almost complete absence of all that is colorful. Noise and the blare of trumpets are conspicuously not present. And these things being so, one can but question the poet's wisdom in relying so constantly as he does on what is pure artifice, namely, rhyme. Moreover, Mr. Lindsay has never shown himself an infallible master of the art of rhyming.

A lyric which is not open to this criticism and one which is perhaps the best poem of the collection is a piece bearing the title "By the Mohawk's Buckskin Door." It should be noted that Mr. Lindsay states that he uses the word "Mohawk," both here and in all other poems in which it occurs, "as a total symbol of all the Red Indian tribes and all the Red Indian Gods from the beginning to the end of time.". The poem follows:

Do we return to the Rockies?
Surely we camp once more
There on the peaks of tomorrow
By the Mohawk's buckskin door.
The old Gods and the new Gods
Must fight in student hearts,
When the new tribes seem most sleepy
Another war-whoop starts.
When the old Gods seem but basalt,
We hear a sistrum ring.
In the end of the years
Will Toth, the scribe,
Or the Mohawk, be our king?

This can scarcely be said to be an unforgettable lyric, but there is enough of lyric wistfulness in the lines to compel one to pause.

But the truth is that Lindsay, in "The Candle in the Cabin," is not so much interested in his poems as he is in the symbolic pen-drawings, symbolic pen-scrolls, which adorn the pages. Nor are these drawings decorations for the poems; the poems are decorations for the drawings. And when this is understood the little book appears in an entirely different light.

On the principle underlying this art-work of his, which has come latterly to assume more and more importance in his books, Mr. Lindsay has written a brief preface. In this preface he states that Spencer, the originator of the system of penmanship bearing his name, built up handwriting into birds and flowers. "But," adds the poet, "if he had used the natural autograph of each man, instead of a watch-spring curve, as the basis of his system of teaching, it might have become a school of art instead of a discarded curiosity." Vachel Lindsay the artist does what Spencer did not. "In all the pictures in this book," he writes, "I have used the letters of the alphabet, capital and small letters, upside down, in circles, on top of one another and all sizes. In short, these pictures are written, not drawn."

For its pictures, then, rather than its poems, is "The Candle in the Cabin" primarily to be considered.

WHICH OF THESE FAULTS KEEP YOU FROM BEING A GOOD DANCER?

It's a shame to let one or two trifling faults keep you from being a really good dancer, when you can so quickly and easily correct them by Arthur Murray's interesting new plan.

Arthur Murray invites you most cordially to drop into his studio for a free analysis of your dancing by his staff of dance experts. They can tell, at a glance almost, exactly what your trouble is and how to overcome it. They are sympathetic fault-finders, genuinely interested in your progress.

In all probability, only a very few lessons will correct your faults—give you poise, ease, finish—enable you to dance the new steps in the smart New York manner.

FREE ANALYSIS of Your Dancing.
There is no charge for the analysis and the lessons themselves are very moderately priced. You'll be delighted with Arthur Murray's new studio, its privacy, its exclusive atmosphere, its youthful enthusiastic instructors, who can improve your dancing marvelously in just a few lessons. Why not call Mr. Murray's secretary today and arrange for the free analysis?

Was Lincoln the Founder of a New Military System?

Major-General Maurice Credits Him With Creating a Model Method of Warfare for Democracies

STATESMEN AND SOLDIERS OF THE CIVIL WAR. By Major Gen. Sir Frederick Maurice. 161 pp. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. Atlantic Monthly Press. $3.

THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. By David Knowles. 212 pp. New York: Oxford University Press, American Branch. $3.

CAMPAIGNS OF THE CIVIL WAR. By Walter Geer. 447 pp. New York: Brentano's. $5.

By ALLEN SINCLAIR WILL

THESE books are an indication of the revival of interest in the story of the Civil War. Controversial historians have torn its passions to tatters, but a new and refreshing method of treatment is developing. The fascination of the conflict as one of the most fruitful in all history for originality, in which capacity for leadership, organization, initiative and inventiveness were shown at their best on both sides, is just beginning to be appreciated.

General Maurice, who was Chief of Operations on the British General Staff during a part of the World War, contributes a novelty of view on one aspect of the conflict of 1861-65 which is bound to attract wide attention. He attempts to add a new leaf to the laurel wreath of Lincoln's fame by demonstrating from the record that the President discovered and applied the system by which democracies must wage war if they are to be successful.

He states a truism when he says that "the general impression in the minds of students of the American Civil War" is that Lincoln failed as a war minister until he handed over the entire control of military affairs to Grant. Then he proceeds to set forth that in the beginning Lincoln was groping for a system, in the finding of which he was greatly hampered by obstacles such as the distrust and reticence of McClellan. In the end the President found what he sought, and, in General Maurice's eyes, it did not embrace the surrender of his functions to Grant, but the exercise of his proper functions in the tactful oversight of a General who was willing to go along with him.

Thus the Lincoln who is so often pictured, despite all his greatness, as inept in military administration is presented as having become a master in that department, a teacher and exemplar of free peoples in the future. His system, in brief, was to adopt a general policy for the conduct of the war, to allow his army commanders to execute it in their own way, if he did not disapprove that way; to supply them with ample resources, to sustain them in temporary adversity, to designate a Chief of Staff (Halleck) whom the General in the field consulted directly, and to keep a close watch on the war dispatches so that he would be ready to intervene as head of the State whenever the occasion for it arose. Such was the plan in operation in 1864-65.

This was far from putting the reins in the hands of Grant and permitting him to drive alone. General Maurice cites instance after instance to show that Grant was well aware that there was a President in Washington "ready to support him when he needed help, to give him a hand if he tripped, to remove him if he failed."

Thus, Lincoln caused Grant to leave the field and go to Washington to give personal supervision to Sheridan's preparations for the last Valley campaign. In fact, General Maurice says that this campaign "was due primarily to his (Lincoln's) initiative and judgment." The President "no longer intervened as he had done in May, '62; he had learned how to intervene wisely and opportunely."

Sometimes he telegraphed to Grant questioning the General's plans, as in February, 1865, when he was misled by a cryptic military dispatch from Sheridan to Grant announcing the former's movement to join the Federal forces in front of Petersburg. Grant sent a satisfactory explanation, and Lincoln apologized for his misconception. His order to Grant about the same time as to relations with General Lee was final and authoritative. It directed Grant to have no conference with Lee except for the purpose of arranging for a surrender of the Confederate forces, and that Grant was "not to decide, discuss or confer upon any political question."

General Maurice does not go so far as to absolve Lincoln from errors, and serious ones at that, in the early stages of the war. Lincoln never pretended to have any qualifications as a military expert, but, Maurice observes, "his brain was of that not uncommon type which finds delight in the intellectual exercises of framing military plans." In his first interview with Grant he "could not resist the temptation to produce a plan of campaign" (of his own), to which Grant listened with respectful attention and utterly ignored, reserving the subject for some shrewd comment in his memoirs.

But the silent Grant, who could listen and forget, had no counterpart in his predecessors. Lincoln was at a great initial disadvantage in 1861 because he did not know the officers of the army personally, while Jefferson Davis, who knew most of the principal officers well, was able to make good selections for the chief Confederate commands.

General Maurice, like all other commentators, points out the "serious blunder" which was made in limiting the service of the first 75,000 Federal volunteers to three months, but, unlike most of these critics, he emphasizes the fact that Lincoln was asking within a month for volunteers to serve three years. He finds no justification for the sending of the short-term men to defeat at Bull Run.

Again, when Lincoln had brought McClellan to Washington to take command, the President, General Maurice says, "did a very foolish thing" in yielding to the popular clamor for action and issuing the President's "General War Orders" 1, 2 and 3, for an advance on Washington's Birthday, 1862, and for the defense of the capital city. Yet he finds strong provocation for Lincoln in the fact that McClellan did not reveal fully his own plans even to the President, and showed suspicion of the civil administration, which caused great irritation. When Lincoln detached McDowell from the Peninsula campaign, Maurice thinks that McClellan's secretiveness was really to blame, though McClellan called it "the most infamous thing that history has recorded."

Lincoln was still learning during the Pope, Burnside and Hooker campaigns, but he really learned while Davis lagged. The Confederate President, the British critic says, never reached the point of formulating a definite system for the conduct of the war.

What was Lincoln's definite war policy, as distinguished from system or strategy for carrying out that policy, upon which he based the whole superstructure that General Maurice says he evolved? Maurice's view is that the policy was the bringing of the greatest possible military pressure to bear against the South at the earliest possible moment. This might seem to be nothing more than a generality, but, as Maurice interprets it, it amounted in application to the policy of constant "hammering," which Grant finally pursued with success.

Of policy and strategy the author writes:

> It is the duty of policy to choose the road for strategy, to set it on its way, to provide means sufficient for the journey, to give timely counsel, to watch the youngster's progress carefully, to be prompt to give a hand should he stumble, to be ready to turn him in a new direction should a change seem necessary or opportune, but to resist the temptation to interfere save as a measure of real emergency, and then to make interference as little obvious as may be.

The book contains chapters on Lincoln's relations with McClellan and Grant and Davis's relations with Johnston and Lee. At the close General Maurice applies the lessons of the Civil War and the World War in conjunction, and reaches the conclusion that Britain must have a system for the future much like the one that Lincoln set up. He thinks that the Prime Minister ought to be virtually a dictator, as Lincoln was. General Maurice says:

> The practice of Rome and the United States should assure us [the British] that there is nothing undemocratic in establishing a temporary dictatorship in time of national emergency. We must, in a great war, have a supreme authority to direct all the armed forces of the empire. That authority must be civil, and it is far better that it should be vested in a man than in a committee.

Jackson's Brigade Standing Like a Stone Wall Before the Federal Onslaught at Bull Run.

From "Howard Pyle's Book of the American Spirit." (Harper & Brothers.)

The book of David Knowles presents another English viewpoint of the Civil War. It is a summary narrative marked by notable detachment of view. The author says that he can plead no qualification for his task save a fascination for the story of the war which has lasted since his earliest days of reading. He succeeds in conveying much of this sense of deep interest to the reader, though errors are to be found in his work. He writes as if General Early had been killed in the war, shows confusion as to the losses at Gettysburg, gives General Scott's first name as Wingfield and says that "Richard Carvel" is a tale of old Virginia instead of Maryland. On main questions his information is accurate and often penetrating.

As Colonel Buchan, the British historian of the World War, has done, Knowles brings out the originality which was shown in 1861-65, such as the development of the armored warship and stationary trench operations, and the adaptation for the first time of the railroad and the telegraph to military purposes.

Like most English writers on the war, Knowles rates Lee high on the roll of the world's greatest captains. He believes that Lee ranks "not far below" Caesar, Hannibal, Cromwell, Condé, Turenne, Marlborough and Frederick the Great. General Maurice, in his book "Robert E. Lee the Soldier," published last year, classed Lee with Napoleon's select group of Alexander, Hannibal, Caesar, Gustavus, Turenne, Eugene and Frederick.

Mr. Geer, who has won his spurs as a historian by six volumes on Napoleon and kindred topics, ranks Lee even higher than these two. He places him as one of the six greatest commanders, the others being Alexander, Hannibal, Caesar, Frederick and Napoleon. Mr. Geer has produced a distinctively American work for which, as a one-volume military history of the Civil War, it would be difficult to find an equal. Its obvious fairness is a striking reminder that the day of partisan histories of the conflict is rapidly passing, and that works of that kind are likely soon to find their way naturally and easily to the rubbish heap.

As a civilian, Mr. Geer is sensible of the difficulties which he encounters in endeavoring to compress within comparatively narrow limits correct perspectives of the many military operations in the war. He has recourse to the happy expedient of quoting military and other authorities often in the body of his text, and has succeeded in doing this without interrupting the thread of his own highly interesting narrative. In particular, he makes use of Major Matthew Forney Steele's "American Campaigns" and the works of Ropes, Henderson, Livermore and General Alexander, as well as biographies, memoirs and the official records of the Union and Confederate Armies, that forbidding array of 128 volumes issued by the Government which is at once the blessing and the bane of investigators.

Interesting pages of Mr. Geer's volume are devoted to a consideration of the finances of the war and the relative advantages and disadvantages of both sides. He is of the opinion that the main cause of the failure of the Southern States to win "seems to have been the bad financial policy adopted by the Confederate Government." When Davis and his Cabinet rejected the proposal to sell the cotton crop in 1861 he believes that they abandoned the best means of raising money which was open to them. With a full Treasury, he holds, the success of the Confederacy would probably have been assured.

About Books, More or Less: Notes of the Season

By SIMEON STRUNSKY

IN the good old Christmas Carol tradition we start out with a dream. It is, however, a modern dream. There are no ghosts in it, nor chimes, nor Yule logs, nor holly, nor mistletoe, but instead, telephones and flivvers and publishers and authors and salesmen. Herr Freud, too, is presumably in it, though just how, it will be left entirely for the reader to determine. Most remarkable of all, perhaps, in this Christmas dream the time setting is six months before Christmas.

Let us say, then, that the time is early in July. The place is either the Maine lakes or the Connecticut shore of Long Island Sound. The immediate scene is a bungalow on the water's edge; a jolly enough bungalow as viewed from the outside, but—such is the fashion of dreams—divided within into dark little cubicles like prison cells. In one of these cells a man in shirt sleeves with a pipe in his mouth is seated before a plain wooden table hard at work over a set of galley proofs. The man is an author in the school of neo-paganism and he is putting the last touches to his new pagan novel.

The author is working hard because the very morning he was called on the long-distance telephone by his publisher, who warned him that unless the author made haste his pagan novel would be too late for the Christmas season. The reader is, of course, aware that Christmas books, like Christmas furs and Christmas neckwear and Christmas magazines, are produced in July. That is why this Yuletide dream, being a modern dream and knowing its way about in the world, has managed to get itself located in midsummer.

The hours pass, the glint on the water turns into a golden sheet, the pipe in the mouth of the author goes out unnoticed as its owner bends to his task. Obviously there is no time to be lost. He sees the spirit of Christmas descending on America's cities, towns and villages, and he is pleased to find that his evocation of Silenus and the Dryads is excellent as it stands. He sees the gift-trees lit up and laden, and finds with satisfaction that the secret of life as revealed in the golden Aphrodite of his manuscript needs no retouching. The ear of the imaginative artist catches the sound of church bells six months in advance and he alters only a few commas in his chapter on the great god Pan. He makes excellent time. By mid-afternoon he is through with the galley proofs. The great god Pan, Silenus, Aphrodite, Jupiter and Io, Jupiter and Europa, Leda and the swan, the Bacchanalia, the Lupercalia, the Saturnalia, are all in order for the Christmas book season. He jumps into his flivver, makes the three miles to the postoffice in seven minutes, and forwards his pagan novel registered and special delivery.

IN another cubicle, or perhaps in the same cubicle—such is the arbitrary way of dreams—another author, or perhaps the same author, is feverishly typing the last pages of his new realistic novel. He has not been so assiduous in application as the other novelist—provided it is another novelist—and July finds him with a couple of chapters still to compose. He, too, has been warned over the long-distance that he must hurry or lose the Christmas market. He hurries, after staring out into vacancy for, let us say, the space of five minutes. He, too, visualizes Christmas. He sees the head of the house, having finished the major shopping, stepping into the bookshop and picking up a book for Her. He sees Her, as a last pleasant touch, picking up a book for Him. He sees both of them going over the book lists with an eye to the children when they get back home for the holiday. He sees two young ones individually dropping into the college book-shop and picking out a book apiece for the two at home.

Having thus visualized the American family in the Christmas mood, our realistic novelist bends over his typewriter and writes. It is about a bleak family inhabiting a dreary homestead in the most God-forsaken quarter-section of Iowa. The head of the house is near to going mad at the sight of his slatternly wife in her coffee-stained apron, and his thoughts turn to the Swedish hired girl in the kitchen. In her rings the call of Pan, or may be it is Dionysus; for it should be noticed that—in dreams the pagan and realist frequently merge and the shimmer of the Parthenon falls on the environs of Corn Hurfs. The author looks up, gazes out into vacancy for a few minutes, and writes. In that Iowa homestead the wife hates her husband; hates him, hates him, hates him, as she often tells herself in the kitchen while the finger nails bite into the flesh of her palms. She hates her husband's method of absorbing cereal, she hates the way he snores, she hates his miserly clutch on the family pocketbook, his religion, his politics, his Adam's apple. The author looks up again and again, though for briefer intervals, and in that Iowa homestead the father and mother hate the children, the children hate their parents and each other, they all hate the Swedish hired girl, and the Swedish hired girl expresses herself forcibly on the subject of the whole family to the Lithuanian hired man washing milk pails behind the barn. And so the chapter is finished, and the manuscript is sealed, and the flivver makes the distance to the postoffice in six minutes and a half, and a novel is ready for the Christmas season when families come together and buy each other books.

IN a third cubicle in that same bungalow—subject to the proviso outlined above—a third author is at work. He is finishing a book on American history for an American public which will spend a billion dollars on Christmas gifts, including books on history. He throws down the last galley sheet and leans back in his chair, highly content. All is as should be. George Washington was at heart and in practice a realtor. Benjamin Franklin was a Babbitt. Thomas Jefferson was a windbag. Alexander Hamilton worked for Wall Street. The Revolution was won because the British ran away faster than the Colonials. The result is America as we see her today. Had these early American men been what we picture them to be in our national mythology instead of what they really were America would by rights be spending now three and a half billion dollars on Christmas gifts instead of a miserable billion. The author is pleased and gets his corrected proofs into the mails in good time for the holiday crowds shopping about for books in the spirit of peace, charity and good-will.

And then, with the last back-fire of the flivver on its way home from the postoffice, the dream vanishes. What the Freudians would make of it, it has already been stated that there will be no attempt here to conjecture. Working in the older style of dream interpretation, the present magician and soothsayer is inclined to invoke the classic hypothesis of indigestion. He can speak, of course, only for himself. The American public, he is ready to admit, is to all appearance much more fortunately situated. It can consume, digest and assimilate so many startling diversities and contradictions. Without turning a hair it purchases pagan novels for a Christian holiday. It celebrates the festival of a Child by investing in gay, sophisticated, civilized books. It commemorates the advent into the world of a message of compassion and succor by purchasing books that lay bare the raw of life to the quick, as the advertisements say. The public absorbs the doctrine of joy in self-realization after the manner of the great god Pan, Jupiter and Danaë, the fauns and the dryads, and it absorbs very nearly a hundred thousand copies of Will Durant's story of the men whose thoughts were busy in quite the opposite direction from the trysting groves of beauteous Hellas. It dallies with Mr. Cabell in the amorous arbors of Poictesme and it walks the hospital wards in the company of Mr. Paul de Kruif, while Henning and Loeffler shoot experimental diptheria anti-toxin into the blue-faced little children. It accepts Mr. Dorsey's explanation of why we behave like human beings and it accepts the detailed descriptions of how we behave as in a barnyard. It believes that a revolution in human nature has taken place since Aug. 2, 1914, when Germany declared war on Russia, and it explains contemporary human nature by its inheritance from Cro-Magnon and Neanderthal 50,000 to 200,000 years ago. All is grist that comes to the book public's mill. It takes the orthodoxies and the heterodoxies, the fundamentalisms and the modernisms, Pasteur and the great god Pan, Attis, Adonis and the atom in its stride.

THAT the present dreamer, however, is not quite alone in his digestive deficiencies there are cumulative reasons for believing. Here and there other uneasy sleepers are stirring. The other night, out in Emporia, Mr. William Allen White sat up in bed, kicked off the blankets, and emitted a magnificent yell via Dr. Canby's Saturday Review. You might have thought it was a Western agriculturalist bawling for farm relief. But it was the West's most eminent sage and editor shouting for rescue of another sort—relief from paganism, relief from exhibitionism, relief from the remorseless evocations that lay bare the raw of life to the very quick of the garbage barrel and the slop-pail. Against the sophisticates, against the debunkers, against the civilized, against the merger of the great god Pan with the deities of the Pullman smoker and the barroom Mr. White lifts up his voice in a superb, in a badly needed howl. He wants a little more understanding, a little more sympathy, a little more emphasis on man's effort to lift himself out of the slime, a little less emphasis on the slime. Facing a mighty anti-Puritan tide for which chief responsibility is laid on Paul of Tarsus, the well-known corrupter of the doctrine of the Mount, this Emporia dyspeptic is reminded, and reminds the alarmed neighborhood, that it was Paul who said that the greatest of these is Love.

There is not much Love running loose in contemporary American fiction, at least in that outstanding class of fiction which addresses itself to the lower vitalities of the better sort of people. There is not much compassion. Instead, there is a grievance and a grouch, mounting not infrequently into hate. Where did we learn our Realism? From Thomas Hardy? From Dostoievsky by way of Great Britain? To what purpose have we read "Jude the Obscure" and "The Brothers Karamazoff?" In the great Russian realists there is plenty of slime, but always the emphasis is on the struggle upward. Their chronicles are suffused precisely with understanding, with pity, with tears. Their people do not always behave like human beings but they are always human. The last purpose in their mind is to muckrake, to expose, to debunk. Their aspirations are precisely toward that Hunk and that Myth which are man's fingerprint, identifying him apart from the beast.

THERE are other uneasy dreamers. Of all places on earth, there have been stirrings of late on an editorial cot in the office of The American Mercury. That restless sleepers in Emporia should rebel against an unbalanced literary diet excessively rich in roughage is natural enough. That Mr. Mencken should be moved to raise his voice in plea—albeit an intermittent voice as yet—for a little less rough stuff in the literary fare, a bit less debunking and flaying and exposing, a bit more Love, is highly significant. And because of its special significance this particular case of indigestion has been studied and commented on in this page from time to time with peculiar interest. The present writer sat up and took notice some months ago when Mr. Mencken, in the course of a little journey into prohibition, found occasion to touch upon Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton. After all, mused Mr. Mencken, these men were of heroic size. Staging a revolution against George III is no fun when you have estates and heads to lose.

Was this a mere slip, or was it a well calculated hint to the Young Guard to lay off the Fathers a bit? It would be hint rather than direct admonition, because Young Guard susceptibilities had to be considered. There was no indirection, however, in a second epistle to the Militants addressed by Mr. Mencken from his Hired Hall in The Sunday World. To the novelists of realism, of iconoclasm, of debunkage the editor of The Mercury remarked, virtually: Please, please, stop trafficking in third-rate ideas and see if you cannot create a living Person for a change. And for a suggestion on how to create true literature he referred his disciples to a man named Thackeray who created a woman named Becky Sharp. Thackeray was fond of Becky.

Perhaps, then, there is in store for us in coming book seasons some concession to William Allen White's outraged demand, to Mr. Mencken's cautious demurrer. A decline in the supply of rough stuff, a little more understanding, a touch of Love.

Queries and Answers

This department is designed to assist in the location of complete versions of poems and their sources, the names of authors, &c., which cannot be found through the usual channels of anthologies and books of reference. THE TIMES receives a great many more queries than it can publish. It endeavors, therefore, to select those of the greatest general interest. Queries should be addressed to the Editor of Queries and Answers, NEW YORK TIMES. They should be written on one side of the paper only, and must contain the name and address of the writer as evidence of good faith.

QUERIES

"We Have Today"

F. A. W.—I think the title of the poem I want is "The Best is That We Have Today," by Whittier, but I have been unable to find it in his collections. The thought of the poem is that all the crime comes to us over the accusing wire but that the homes of peace and votes unsold are not reported. Can any one help me find it?

"His Better Self"

F. W. F.—I would like very much to obtain the correct quotation of which the following statement is part, and also know the source of the quotation.

He that abridgeth the right of anything that God intended to live
And comes to the best that God intended it to be
Must first abridge his own rights.
And forever fail to come to his better self.

"Odes of Hafis"

E. B.—Will some reader tell me where I might find a complete copy of the Persian poem "Odes of Hafis"? It has been translated from the Persian by Colonel Rundall under the name of "Selections from the Rubaiyat and Odes of Hafis." Mrs. A. E. R. Craig gives some stanzas in her book "The Beloved Rajah," among which are the following lines:

Oh, Dear One, hid from my sight
* * * I commend thee to God,
Thou hast consumed me with love for thee,
Yet in my heart I must hold thee as a friend. (Ode 49.)

"By Douglas Mallock"

L. C. L.—Would some one tell me the title of a poem by Douglas Mallock concerning gossip? I cannot give any more information about it.

"The Charles'"

F. M. D.—Where may I find a poem on the Charles, the last lines of which are, "Thank God the last of the Charles' are ended," &c.?

"A Bird at Daybreak"

A. D. L.—I would like to know the name and address of the author of this poem:

I heard a bird at break of day
Sing from the Autumn trees,
A song, so mystical and sweet,
So full of certainties.
No man, I think, could listen long,
Except on bended knees,
Yet this was a simple bird
Alone, among dead trees.

"Socrates Snooks" and "Ruby"

F. A. B.—Where can I find the old story in rhyme beginning: "Socrates Snooks, the Lord of creation, a second time entered the marriage relation," and also one entitled "How Ruby Played"?

"What Is the Title"

A. M. W.—Any help that your readers may give me to find the poem of which these lines are a part would be appreciated:

I never crossed your threshold with a grief
But that I went without it; never came
Heart hungry but you fed me
And gave the sorrow solace and relief.

"My Son"

V. H. W.—The following lines were written by a captain in the army during the late war and are entitled, I believe, "My Son." Does any one know where I may find the complete poem containing them?

My son, what wonderful words;
My boy, what wonderful phrase;
We are waiting the time till you come to us,
And counting the weeks and the days.

"Your Friendship"

M. E. N.—I would like to have a complete copy of the poem, "Your Friendship," by Alice E. Allen.

"Man His Own Enemy"

L. M. W.—Can you give me any information as to the source and authority of a story relating to the theme, man his own greatest enemy? The narrative as given to me runs as follows and may be from a Greek philosopher. A man cognizant of an active enemy, searches for that enemy diligently. He is finally confronted by a masked figure which he determines to destroy. The figure asks him to allow him to unmask. On lifting the mask, the countenance of the speaker is revealed. His enemy is himself.

"Into the Woods" and "Brotherhood"

B. W. S.—In which of Sidney Lanier's poems do these lines occur: "Into the woods the master went"? And where may I find the poem "Brotherhood," by Dr. Charles M. Sheldon?

"A Messenger of Fate"

E. P. H.—Does any one know the words of a poem by Senator Morgan of Alabama called "An Ode to Opportunity"? The opening lines are, "I am the messenger of Fate, I knock unbidden once at every gate."

"By James Whitcomb Riley"

F. W. A.—Can you tell me where I can find the passage in James Whitcomb Riley expressing the thought that it is better to have had a child and lost it than never to have had one at all?

"The City"

M. C.—Where may I find the rest of the poem of which the last line of each stanza is, "A boy goes whistling down the street and I am alone"?

ANSWERS

"Trumpets of War"

MISS A. THOMSON, Orange, N. J.—The quotation, "And I heard sounds of insult, shame and wrong; the trumpets blown for war," which is on the title page of Thomas Hardy's "The Dynasts," for which J. A. B. inquires in your issue of Nov. 21, will find them in Alfred Tennyson's "A Dream of Fair Women" (stanza five).

Miss Alice T. Frost, Mount Vernon, N. Y.; A. W. Answer, Chicago, Ill., and Woodford Patterson, Ithaca, N. Y., and Miss Leslie McCarty, Chamberaburg, Pa., also answered this query.

"A Little While Is Gone"

DAVID O'LEARY, Kings Park, N. Y.—I don't think the answer to P. H. W. in your issue of Nov. 28 is the one wanted, as it has no resemblance to the quotation given.

I saw her once—a little while,
And then no more;
'Twas paradise on earth a while,
And then no more.
Among the throng—she passed along
The meadowed floor,
Spring seemed to smile on earth awhile
And then no more.

The poem above is by James Clarence Mangun and is probably the one desired by your correspondent. I do not recall it all, and, unfortunately, it is not included in a small collection of his Morris Irish literature.

"Miami"

FRANK WADE, New York.—One of your correspondents, O. S., inquires in your issue of Nov. 14 for a poem "Miami the Beautiful," by Anne Le Barre Kester. I found a copy of it among my papers and send it herewith:

On the banks of Miami River,
As it winds on its jade green way,
Disclosing to one many beauties
Ere it flows into Biscayne Bay,
Stands a famous and beautiful city
"The Magic City" we proudly say;
And we know we are not boasting vainly,
For it's the opinion of all tourists today.

The stanza above is the first of the three-stanza poem, which is too long for publication here. A complete copy has been sent to our correspondent. Mrs. Lena K. George, Towanda, Pa., also sent in the poem.

"Tape"

DR. FLOY McEWEN, Newark, N. J.—The following words are commonly sung to tape and may be the ones requested by V. W. H. in your issue of Nov. 21:

Day is done,
Gone the sun,
From the lake,
From the hills,
From the sky;
Safely rest
All is well
God is love.

C. W. Cowban, New York City, veteran of '61, and Miss A. Brooke, New York, and Mrs. Mary P. Hartzell, Carthage, Ill., also sent in the quotation.

"Man Recovered, Dog Died"

MISS EVA S. MILLER, Librarian, Leavenworth, Kan.—In your issue of Nov. 21 O. I. C. requested the author of the poem containing the lines: "The man recovered from the bite, the dog it was that died." These are the two last lines of the last stanza of Dr. Oliver Goldsmith's poem entitled "An Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog." It may be found in his "Poems and Plays" and in Dana's "Household Book of Poetry" and Stevenson's "Home Book of Verse," as well as in other poetry anthologies.

A number of readers answered this request, not a few of whom sent in complete copies of the poem. One has been forwarded to our correspondent.

"Life"

DR. SARAH PARKER WHITE, Syracuse, N. Y.—Concerning the poem requested by G. L. K. in your issue of Nov. 14, I quote the following from the Phillips Brooks Year Book, published by E. P. Dutton & Co., 1893. The poem is there credited to Richard Watson Gilder and if there be a prelude to the quoted section the same is not indicated.

Live thou deeply and wise:
Suffer as never before;
Know joy, till it cuts to the quick;
Eat the apple, Life, to the core.
Be thou cursed
By them thou hast blessed, by the sick
Whom thou in thy weakness nursed.
Be praised when 'twere better to blame;
In the home of thy spirit be true.
Though the voice of the street cry shame.
Be silent till all is done,
Then return, in the light of the sun,
And once more sing.
Oh, then fling
Into music thy soul! . . .
And the world, that shall listen at last.

"My Comrade"

EDWARD WITHERSPOON, Pittsfield, Mass.—R. D. M., in your issue of Nov. 14, asks for the author of the following:

Grow strong, my comrade . . . that you may stand
Unshaken when I fall; that I may know
The shattered fragments of my song will come
At last to finer melody in you;
That I may tell my heart that you begin
Where passing I leave off, and fathom more.

This quotation is dedicated in "The Story of Philosophy" (Simon & Schuster Company, New York), by Will Durant, to his wife and, as he does not use quotation marks, I judge it is original with him. Mrs. L. Alsberg, St. Louis, Mo., also answered this request.

"Rubbing Shoulders"

MISS LOUELLA D. EVERETT, Boston, Mass.—I hope the appended poem is the one wanted by J. B. S. in your issue of Nov. 21. It was printed (author's name not given) on the woman's page of The Boston Herald early in November.

TOUCHING SHOULDERS.

There's a comforting thought at the close of the day,
When I'm weary and lonely and sad,
That sort of grips hold of my crusty old heart
And bids it be merry and glad.
It gets in my soul and it drives out the blues,
And finally thrills through and through.
It is just a sweet memory that chants the refrain:
"I'm glad I touched shoulders with you!"

We have not space to print the other two stanzas. A complete copy has been forwarded to our correspondent. Virginia White, Alton, Ill., also contributed the poem.

"If You but Knew"

J. E. DONSBACH, Brooklyn, N. Y.—In your issue of Nov. 21, J. F. M. asks for the complete poem "If You But Knew." This poem is contained in a book of poems entitled "All That's Lovely," compiled by Samuel Francis Woolard—copyright 1909 by the Goldsmith-Woolard Publishing Company, Wichita, Kan. The poem is from The New Orleans Picayune and begins as follows:

If you but knew
How all my days seemed filled with dreams of you,
How sometimes in the silent night,
Your eyes thrill through me with their tender light,
How oft I hear your voice when others speak,
How you 'mid other forms I seek,
Oh, love more real than though such dreams were true
If you but knew.

Miss Sallie Ulrich, Brooklyn, N. Y., and Mrs. Frederick Hanger, Little Rock, Ark., also contributed the poem, a copy of which has been sent to our correspondent.

Apologies for a Pair of Kings

John Drinkwater and Shane Leslie Retouch the Portraits Of Charles II and George II

MR. CHARLES, KING OF ENGLAND. By John Drinkwater. With illustrations. 324 pp. New York: George H. Doran Company. $5.

GEORGE THE FOURTH. By Shane Leslie. With illustrations. 208 pp. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $4.

WHEN Mr. Drinkwater turns from the dialogue of Abraham Lincoln and of Oliver Cromwell to an apology for King Charles II and when Mr. Shane Leslie extols the numerous but hitherto unappreciated virtues of King George IV, we need to pause for a moment and take our bearings. To the Greeks, history was a muse. But, as every modern is aware, this idea was a mistake and history today is a pair of spectacles decipherning a manuscript. The laboratory of research, content with an operating table on which to dissect people, post mortem, has no use for those mere desks on which the Gibbons and the Plutarchs inflated the annals of mankind.

It is upon this silent sea of sedentary scholarship that unlicensed birdmen like Mr. Drinkwater and Mr. Shane Leslie alight in their piratical airplanes. It is true that they have not ignored the manuscripts. Mr. Drinkwater, who is growing up to be quite grandiose, tenders gracious thanks to Lord Sandwich for access to the Hinchenbrooke Papers, while Mr. Shane Leslie, whose style is Lytton Strachey rendered staccato, has playfully "nibbled" at his Greville and his Creevey.

But the claim of these men to our attention rests not on the parchments which they have perused, but upon the insight which they have brought to bear upon original calligraphy. The understand for history as an interpretation, for the eye that sees as well as the document that is seen. The modern has studied archives, collated them, printed them and eliminated himself from the equation. The least taint of a style renders the historian a suspect. The Drinkwaters and the Shane Leslies say that this photography of the past is not enough. The picture must be a moving picture.

The question is now whether scientific history can expel the intruders. After all, erudition will become impossible if we are to drift back to the crudities of Scott and Shakespeare and other victims of the picturesque. Is Mr. Drinkwater to be permitted to degrade history to the level of mere drama? Is Mr. Shane Leslie to go unpunished when he takes the blueprints of history and transforms them into belles-lettres? Is it possible for universities to sit acquiescent while the passive receptivity of knowledge is thus vitalized into argument, sympathy and the impulses of the partisan? It is greatly to be feared that, unless Mr. Drinkwater especially be at once disowned by the pundits, history will degenerate from a card catalogue of the monument room to the deplorable eloquence of Livy, Thucydides and Froude. The essential dullness of knowledge will be entirely lost.

Charles II at the Time of His Restoration.

The interpretative historian is, happily, a human. Just as the archaeologist delves in the sand, hoping for a find, so do our authors, aim at a truth which, other things being equal, they would like also to be a novelty. To repeat that black is black, interests no one. But the conjurer who can take black and turn it into white deserves his turn in the vaudeville of culture. History, already reduced to legend, survives as legerdemain.

Hitherto, we have been told that, broadly, Kings Charles II and George IV were bad kings. We open these books and, hey presto, we find that the Kings are aces, the best cards in the whole pack. Mr. Drinkwater's wand as magician is something of a sceptre. If Charles is mere "Mr.," his sponsor is Majesty. It is with a certain pontifical infallibility that he absolves the unmerry monarch from the pains and penalties of the purgatory to which he was consigned by a political vatican of Whigs. Mr. Shane Leslie is more sprightly than sacerdotal. He is the advocate, pitting at Brougham and Denman, and demanding that King George IV be granted his divorce from Queen Caroline. So is founded what we may call the Whitewash School of historical intuition. The bad are good and the good are bad. We experience the charming uncertainty attributed to games like cricket which take a long time to play.

Apparently, the reversal of the popular judgment is not based on any new fact. Mr. Drinkwater permits King Charles to sit in his oak-tree and to flirt with the ladies. And Mr. Shane Leslie displays his favorite George, drunk as a brute on his wedding night. These little stories were not slander. Not at all; they were what happened. But Charles with his ladies and George with his scandals were not such bad fellows after all. It was the fault of their brides that things went wrong. Caroline was wholly unreasonable. She desired a husband who was not tipsy. And so with Catherine of Braganza. She actually objected to Barbara Villiers as a Lady of the Bedchamber.

That these monarchs, when on show, had decent manners has never been denied by their severest critics. But the mere fact that Charles was polite to titled ladies in their old age and that a jaded George found solace in Jane Austen's novels does not prove—or does it?—that the estimable sensualists were chivalrous to women. In an era, celebrated by Pepys, Charles was exceptional throughout Europe for the vices he displayed and not less prominent in an era of Lord Hertford and Beau Brummel was George.

The wives were thus at fault; it was the mistress who played the heroine. And here both Mr. Drinkwater and Mr. Shane Leslie have been furnished by their respective kings with an ample variety of choice. On the whole, Mr. Shane Leslie has selected Lady Conyngham for admiration. That she was reasonable over Catholic emancipation and kind to little Victoria are facts to her credit. But her rapacity was notorious. Everything that came her way, jewels, jobs and even bishoprics, she seized. When George was dying, her wagons stood in the courtyard of Windsor Castle, loaded with booty, and, if she had not been prevented, she would have stripped the place bare. But doubtless she was, as Mr. Shane Leslie indicates, an excellent woman.

Mr. Drinkwater dismisses Nell Gwynn as a subordinate factor in the chivalries of King Charles. The lady that he recommends is Louise de Kerouaille, whom Charles created the Duchess of Portsmouth. He does not deny that Louise was not only the King's mistress but the paid spy of France, whose price was the Treaty of Dover, to obtain which Charles was offered and accepted a bribe from a foreign power. These are details which Mr. Drinkwater disguises as calmly as players yawn over a humdrum hand at bridge. "Every one knew," he says, "that sharping was the code of the game." What appears to Mr. Drinkwater to determine the ethics of the business was the circumstance that, when Charles fell ill, Louise "soothed him." Well, a mistress, though corrupt and an agent of espionage, need not be a monster. After all, Louise wanted her Charles to get well again, and for reasons not wholly disinterested.

Not that we would be hard on Louise. As Mr. Drinkwater says, it was her trade. But how does Charles come out of it? Apparently we are to regard his treachery to Britain as a mere peccadillo. According to Mr. Drinkwater, the one really disgraceful act of his life was not this accepting of bribes and a mistress from France—that did not much matter—but the dismissal of Clarendon into exile. That Clarendon stood by Charles when he was poor and friendless is true enough. But, as it seems to us, the issue did not lie only between Charles and his Minister. England may have been unimportant, but England did at least exist. And a Minister, with full executive authority, who permitted an enemy, the Dutch, to cruise within the mouth of the Thames, raiding the environs of London, was after all under responsibility. It was not Charles but the nation that called Clarendon to account. There was a limit even to the forbearance of that sycophantic generation.

In a passage none the less admirable because it is in the manner of Bagehot, Mr. Drinkwater elucidates what is to England the mysticism and to America the mystery of kingship. We agree with him that the person of the King symbolizes the sum total of the nation. But the claim made by our authors, that their respective monarchs were founders of constitutional sovereignty, is surely grotesque. Charles governed through a Minister; that is true. But so did the Tudors; so did the Hapsburgs. As Mr. Drinkwater himself tells us, Charles had less and less use for the encumbrance of a Parliament.

And how about George? Shane Leslie tells us how he restored Windsor Castle, inspired stucco on Regent Street, gave £200 of the nation's money to Beethoven, developed Buckingham Palace and sat for his portrait to Lawrence. But the notion that he left the throne an unshakable security is, we submit, a defiance of the facts. Despite all George's virtues, the England that he left behind him was the only England, other than the Cromwellian Protectorate, that has ever been near a republic. The growing towns were organizing against the Crown. And Ireland had been driven by the Crown to the very verge of civil war. The City of London itself, today a stronghold of Toryism, talked like a commune.

Mr. Drinkwater, with his solemnity, is thus delightful. And Shane Leslie, with his indignation, is a provocation to debate. We hope that both these writers will continue and prosper. In there not much to be said, after all, for Nero and Abdul Hamid? Were not these excellent rulers much misjudged? For the interpretative historian, the opportunities are endless.

French History as Seen by Mr. Belloc

MINIATURES OF FRENCH HISTORY. By Hilaire Belloc. New York: Harper & Brothers. $3.50.

FROM the founding of Marseilles in 599 B. C. by some Greek mariners to the battle of the Marne in 1914, Mr. Belloc selects some thirty subjects of French history for his "miniatures." They are small battle scenes, heroic portraits and romantic incidents. Each stands for some important stage in French history or perhaps English history, as the sketch of the flight of the exiled James II or again a tragic moment for both countries as in the brilliant paper called "Blanchetaque," a decisive encounter before the battle of Crécy.

The central point of the history of France as outlined in these miniatures lies far from France. It is "The Triumph of Saladin," the story of the battle of Hattin; fought on Saturday (Mr. Belloc gives the day of the week), July 4, 1187, in which Jerusalem was lost to the Christian powers. Here appears a characteristic touch of Mr. Belloc as Catholic historian, for he looks upon the Christian powers of the West as one, bound together by the faith. The battle of Hattin is not often remembered among the decisive conflicts of history, but Mr. Belloc writes of it:

This was the end of the fight which decided the vast affair between our people and those of the East. Thenceforth, point by point, we lost the mastery of the Mediterranean; we admitted the stranger everywhere. We sowed the harvest of tragedy which is today the Balkans, the Dardenelles, the isolation of the Slav. Spain only we recovered. And as for the fragment of the cross, they carried it away to Damascus. Jerusalem was theirs that Autumn. Whose is it today?

Another sketch of unusual interest and one which may be taken as marking the turning of modern France from the old faith is called "The End of Chateaubriand." It is the only miniature of a literary man among the pages of kings and captains. And the lesson Mr. Belloc wants to teach is:

That insecure, moving, intense soul of his was steeped in its own time, thinking that sublime which today we think grotesque and which tomorrow our descendants may think sublime again.

Chateaubriand lies buried in his tomb cut out of a rock in the sea, and is mostly ignored as literary artist and defender of the Christian belief, but for Mr. Belloc:

No one can say at all whether, with the passage of time, he who was at that moment the greatest of the great will become greater still, or insignificant.

Over a period of 2,000 years, it is doubtful that any national history affords such a wealth of dramatic incident as that of France. The subjects Mr. Belloc has picked out are some of them as well known as the day at Roncesvalles, sometimes as obscure as the story of Louis XIV and Samuel Bernard, the money lender. His richest field is in the stories of Greek and Roman colonization, the conversion of the people, the breaking of the Moslem power, the coming of the Normans, the foundation of the Capetian dynasty, the conquest of England, the crusades, and the Hundred Years War. Modern history offers him much less. In all his list there is no miniature of Jeanne d'Arc and there is nothing standing for the great upheaval of the French revolution. The Napoleonic war supplies a single miniature, the War of 1870 one and the great war one.

Mr. Belloc has followed a historic progression of literary style as he tells the story of France through the ages. From an Old Testament flavor in the first miniature, he passes through a colorful middle period to a modern description of a scene from the last war. He looks at history always as a warm champion of the Church, a lover of the romantic and the heroic.

Fanny Burney's "Sensibility"

Two Social Historians Throw New Light on the Mentality Of a Famous Family

FROM diaries and correspondence, from the apparently inconsequential notations of individuals writing to individuals or for their own private pleasure, the social historian gathers his most startling and lifelike material of past eras. And when these notations are made by so intelligent a group as the Burney family the social historian has much for which to be thankful. There have been a number of books about the various Burneys besides their own output, so many pages, in fact, as to suggest an exhaustion of the source-material. Both Mr. Johnson and Miss Rolt, however, prove that this is not so by the publication of heretofore overlooked matter. In Mr. Johnson's book, "Fanny Burney and the Burneys," the curious reader will find additions to Mme. d'Arblay's (Fanny Burney's) Diary, a series of letters from her sister, Susan, and a journal of the Worcester Burneys, besides selections from the works of Dr. Burney, his children, and grandchildren which have already appeared in printed form. Miss Rolt's book is entirely taken up with the journals of Fanny Anne Burney (Mrs. Wood), a great-niece of that more famous Fanny who wrote "Evelina" and was the pet of the great Dr. Johnson. To understand this matter one must have some conception of the Burney family and its place in English literary and social history.

The fame of the name Burney rests today almost wholly on the work and legendary personality of Fanny Burney, Mme. d'Arblay, who wrote such novels as "Evelina" and "Camilla." "Next to the balloon," wrote Mrs. Barbauld, "Miss Burney is the object of public curiosity." There were reasons for this. In the first place, Fanny Burney was a pioneer in fiction. She was a connecting link, as it were, between Richardson and Fielding on the one side, and Jane Austen on the other. Besides this she was a high favorite in that particular group that was ruled by Dr. Johnson. "The little Burney" was petted and coddled to her heart's content and if, as is quite possible, she took advantage of this in her material progress through the world she was quite justified. Her wit and vivacity and gayety and, above all, her emanations of "sensibility" were distinct adjuncts to her in this rather pleasant struggle with fortune. But though Fanny glowed the brightest perhaps, of all the Burneys, it must not be thought that she alone was unique in the particular England of her day. She was, after all, the daughter of her father. Dr. Charles Burney was unusual in many ways. He was a born showman out of hemic who had been taken up by the great, and though he was obviously a snob this does not withdraw our admiration for his peculiar manifestations. He was a musician who had been patronized by the elegant Fulke Greville and who, through charm, industry, and some degree of talent, had made the most of big opportunities. He was, after all, a fit father for the climbing Miss Fanny Burney who became Mme. d'Arblay as well as a member of the household of Queen Caroline.

His other children, the brothers and sisters of Fanny, continued the streak of talent that bound the family together. James Burney rose to be a Rear Admiral and Charles Burney, "the second Doctor," secured the nickname of "the Grecian" because of his familiarity with Greek letters. At one time he was hailed as the third finest Greek scholar in England. Susan and Esther (Hetty). Fanny's two sisters, were both sensitive and intelligent women. Then there was Fanny's cousin, Edward Burney, who gave great promise as an artist. The distinguished qualities of the family continued in Fanny's nephew, Charles Parr Burney, the son of "the Grecian," for he became Professor of Ancient Literature at the Royal Academy. It was the daughter of this third Charles, still another Fanny, who wrote the journals which make up Miss Rolt's "A Great-Niece's Journals." These two books, therefore, give a panoramic picture of the activities of the Burney family throughout more than half a century, say roughly, from 1787 to 1842.

Mr. Johnson's book, being concerned with the older branch of the family, is possibly more important, but certainly is not more interesting than "A Great-Niece's Journals." His compilation achieves its prime importance because of the inclusion of some 30,000 words which Fanny Burney and her editors dropped from the published Journals and Diaries. Just why they were dropped is a mystery. Certainly Fanny's "sensibility" must have been excessive if she thought they were calculated to hurt any feelings. These new notations cover Fanny's trip to France and they include rather amusing observations of individuals and scenes. No one can doubt the diarist's bright eye for effects any more than one can doubt the peculiar prudishness that formed a part of Fanny's "sensibility." She hesitates to enter into conversation with a woman suspected of being an "actress." Upon discovering the woman's nefarious calling Fanny notes: "This was not surprising to me, from her appearance, though I felt a little awkward in her junction, without knowing something of her character. However, it was amongst the chances I was forced to run." It is to be hoped that Fanny came off with none of her morals impaired. After her arrival in Paris the compliments of Mlle. de L., "who desired to know how I did after my journey," were brought to her and as the passage gives an excellent picture of Fanny's mind and the material contained in these heretofore suppressed portions of the Diary, it may be quoted:

> I sent my thanks and that I was tolerably well, but meant to take a week's rest before I should feel recovered. My dear padre will not think this quite so elegant as it was sincere; but here comes another alas! Certain reports against this lady, with respect to her amitie for an old and admired friend of ours, had made me anxious to defer the acquaintance, till I could know better with what degree of intimacy, or coldness, to begin it. I soon found, however, my precaution rather too late; she had already formed the project of a free connexion, had sent, also des confitures, for Alex; and persuaded M. D'Ar to let her chuse me a cap and a hat from her own Milliner. This was embarrassing; especially as I had no time to speak upon the subject before there came another message, that she would enquire herself how I did, if it were not indiscreet. M. D'A ° ° ° said it would be impossible to refuse: and upstairs she took the trouble to mount. She is still even pretty, nay almost more, almost beautiful, except for very bad teeth; her complexion is fair and smooth, her eyes very fine, and all her features good; her dress was a very elegant déshabillé, though not in first repair, and she has a look that, had I not been prejudiced against her, would have struck me as mingling benevolence of character with spirit of disposition.

In Fanny Anne Burney's Journals there is, perhaps, more color in the sense of historical approaches. Great names star these diaries from which Miss Rolt has fashioned "A Great-Niece's Journals." It is obvious that a later generation is writing, but only in the period sense that informs the work. So far as personality is concerned Fanny Anne is as much a Burney as the great Fanny. The many amusing notations make quotation difficult, but take the following as an example:

> Oct. 5th, 1851.—Messrs. H. and E. Foss, Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Behnes, the sculptor, Dr. Dibdin, the bibliographer, and Sir William Beatty, to Dinner. This latter gentleman was the surgeon on board the "Victory" at the Battle of Trafalgar, and Lord Nelson may almost be said to have died in his arms. He possesses, and once showed me, a most eccentric relic of the great naval hero, viz., the eye which Nelson lost at the siege of Calvi, which Sir William had preserved and caused to be set in Crystall (sic!).

And here is another:

> July 12th.—We spent an hour or two pleasantly with Mr. Wordsworth, the Poet, at his house at Rydal Mount. He was suffering from one of his attacks in the eyes, ever which he wore a green shade, which did not tend to improve his personal appearance; his forehead is broad and high. Mr. Wordsworth appeared to us a simple-mannered old man; not very polished, but apparently very-kind-hearted.

So one might go on plucking these bits from a work that is a running chain of amusing and slightly quaint observations on figures and a life that is now part of history. It is through this type of letters that an overwhelming sense of nearness and intimacy with the phenomena of the past is awakened in the reader. Sir William Beattie, with the eye of Nelson set in crystal, or William Wordsworth with a green shade fastened to his high forehead, renders us most acutely aware of the humanity of those people. The man who stood on the deck of the Victory with Nelson while the air was black with cannon fire or the far-removed mind that created the "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality" do not seem so human to us as these figures (in spiritual undress, as it were) who sit about the table with Fanny Anne Burney. And with how much more relish do we read Evelyn's Diary when we discover from Miss Burney's pages that Mr. Upcott, visiting Wotton Place and examining some of the old letters, is informed by Lady Evelyn: "Dear me! I have used a great many for thread papers, and Betty, the housemaid, has burnt a great many to light fires, but if you care for such ancient things there are a great quantity of them in a black cabinet upstairs and in trunks in a lumber room." Mr. Upcott, of course, nearly broke his leg getting upstairs to that black cabinet, and in it he found, patiently awaiting its editor, the Diary of Lord Evelyn.

The Burneys were not, it is true, a typical family. They were too bright, too much in the public eye of their time. Still, through them we observe the typical life of their era, for they were always curious and observant and made it a point to perpetuate their impressions and reactions.

The Man Who Made the Microphone

EMILE BERLINER, MAKER OF THE MICROPHONE. By Frederic William Wile. Introduction by Herbert C. Hoover. Illustrated. 253 pp. Indianapolis: The Robbs-Merrill Company. $5.

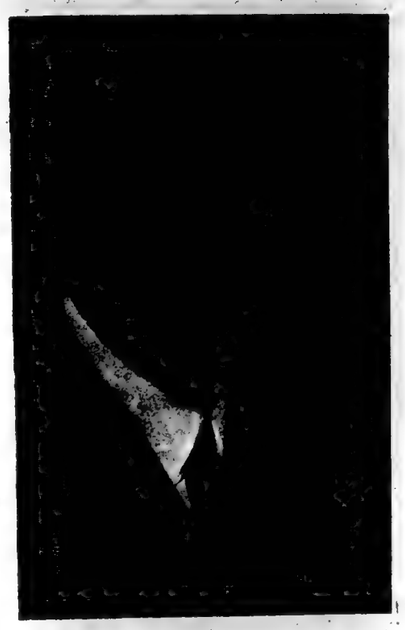
MORE generally known as the "transmitter" of the telephone and the "mike" of the radio, the microphone is a tiny thing to have made so vast, so awe-inspiring a difference in the world. Mr. Wile's artistic instinct is right when it leads him to stress so frequently the contrast between the world of today and the world that knew not either telephone or radio. The man to whom this modern world is indebted for them, and also for other things, has lacked a good "press," and so it has failed to give him his due share of the recognition and gratitude it feels for Bell and Edison and Marconi. But now it can make good its defect, for Mr. Wile's biography of Emile Berliner, the man whose inventions made possible the world-wide usefulness of telephone, gramophone and broadcasting apparatus, shows how intimately his genius is bound up in their success.

The story of Berliner's life is still another story of how American opportunity, the conditions of American life, make possible the development of ability and open the way to splendid achievement. He came to this country, a lad of 19, in 1870, without money, almost without friends, in the hope that here he would find a better chance to earn a livelihood than in his native Hanover. For almost ten years he worked at anything that came handy, clerking in a men's furnishings store in Washington, serving in the Middle West as "drummer" for a Milwaukee establishment, in New York toiling as a printer's devil, selling glue, painting backgrounds for enlarged tintype portraits, working as handy man in a chemical laboratory. It was in this last place that his interest in scientific research began to manifest itself. He spent many evenings at Cooper Institute, that potent nurse and alma mater of immigrant talent and ambition, and a drug store friend gave him a book on physics in which two chapters on acoustics and electricity so fascinated him, that he studied them until he almost knew them by heart. Back in Washington as a bookkeeper, young Berliner began spending every moment he could spare in acoustical studies and experiments. That was in 1876 and he was 25 years old.

The telephone, which had been exhibited at the Centennial, was being talked of and written about. He had not yet seen an instrument, he had had no scientific training, he had no equipment for experiment nor money with which to buy it. Neither did he, says his biographer, have conscious purpose or definite objective. But he was profoundly interested in physical science in general and in sound transmission in particular, and the conviction had deepened in his mind that somewhere in the electrical field he would find his career. Moreover, the atmosphere of the whole country in that Centennial year was electric with optimism and boundless aspiration. "He had become thoroughly infected," says Mr. Wile, "with the creative spirit that saturated the country." He he filled his back room in a humble Washington lodging house with wires and batteries and other paraphernalia, rigged up telephones to the barn, and, using a soapbox, a sheet of iron, an ordinary screw and a steel dress button, in a few months he solved the problem of an adequate speech transmitter and gave to Bell's telephone the improvement which it had to have before it could become a commercial success.

That was fifty years ago, lacking a few weeks, and the half century that has elapsed has been filled with labors and achievements and humanitarian efforts. Mr. Wile tells the long story in detail—his welcome into the Bell company, the years of determined litigation over his patent, his invention of the gramophone, which made possible the perfected talking machine of today; radio's indebtedness to him and his many efforts for the conservation of public health and the welfare of children. Of Berliner's contribution to the talking machine, Mr. Wile says that while his instrument had its predecessors, it was scientifically the most perfect machine and it has proved to be commercially the most successful.

The whole story reads almost like a fairy tale—even if present-day American biography affords so many tales of similar magic quality. But if America rubbed the immigrant boy's ring to give him marvelous achievement, fame and fortune, his biographer makes it clear that he brought his ring with him, in the shape of native ability and character, willingness to work, determination to succeed. Mr. Wile tells the interesting and inspiring story with full appreciation of its dramatic features.



Emile Berliner.

Notes on Rare Books

UNDER the inviting title of "A Snuff-Boxful of Bibles," Wilbur Macey Stone, chief expositor in America of the miniature book, and high priest of its devotees, describes the choicest of these titbits. His own recollection, which appears to be very complete, provides the illustrations for this most engaging little book, which has been very ably printed by Douglas C. McMurtrie, Inc., in an edition of 200 copies for the Cartoret Book Club of Newark. A few of these are for sale, apparently, and may be obtained from the Secretary, Mr. Stone (15 Park Row), by a little judicious wheedling and a check for $7.

It seems that the first of these Biblical minims was written by John Taylor (can we mention his name, we wonder, without adding the inevitable "the Water Poet"?), published in 1614, with the high-astounding titles of "Verbum Sempiternae" for the Old Testament, and "Salvator Mundi" for the New. This is but 1⅛ by 1⅛ inches in size, hardly wide enough, one would believe, for the title, and only one copy of it, that owned by Colonel James Allardyce (now in Aberdeen University Library) appears to have survived.

It was not the first book of such insignificant dimensions to have appeared in England, for another that could match it for diminutiveness, Weever's "Agnus Dei," had been issued in 1601. Although this may have given Taylor, or his publishers, the idea for a miniature book for children, no one else, we think, could have been responsible for the contents. Mr. Stone makes some judicious quotations from them, and it may be thought equally judicious of us to repeat them here. Not everybody may be able to buy Mr. Stone's delightful book, and pity 'twere should they miss the refreshing versification of Biblical episodes which Taylor composed for the young and inexperienced. Among these are:

The Murm'ring people, fearing famines, rules,
God rains down Manna from the heav'n and quailes.

[and]

Young David comes, and in his hand a sling,
And with a stone the giant doune doth fling.

The Jewes are sav'd by Eshers wife from death,
And Haman and his sons, hangd, lose their breath.

In later editions a more skilled hand cleared up the ambiguity of some of these lines, and considerably improved the verse for adults. This is the result of unwarranted academic intrusion; we are absolutely certain the children preferred the earlier versions:

To th' murmuring People, who do Famine dread;
God, Quailes for Meat, and Manna offers for Bread.

SEVERAL factors operated against the preservation of such tiny books as this of Taylor's, among which were such obvious ones as their size (their use by children and the indifference of adults to "toy" books. It is to be counted fortunate, therefore, to say the least, that Mr Stone should have been able to garner such a collection as is displayed through his interesting essay on miniature Bibles. Much more than an account of the various editions of Taylor's book is related in his little treatise, and nearly thirty illustrations of different literary microcosms will indicate how full is his consideration of the subject.

If miniature books are not popular, so enthusiastic a propagandist as Mr. Stone will make them so. And, considering the exigencies of our so-called civilization, among them the dimensions of a modern apartment, a lilliputian library might be a very wise and practical thing to own. It really must be an advantage to have a library that can be concealed in several snuff-boxes, if one has the snuff-boxes, and retained on a shelf positively no longer than five feet. It must be an advantage, really—if one can only find these rare little books.

There also comes to us from Mr. Stone a publication of The Triptych, which is a club of three members, Messrs. Jay Chambers, William Jordan and Mr. Stone. So long ago as 1880, for St. Valentine's Day, it issued to its friends a booklet containing two love sonnets of Gaspara Stampa, who lived in Venice in the sixteenth century. It has published only intermittently since then, including several small books on bookplates, &c. Each edition carrying its imprint is usually limited to ninety-nine copies.

TO the thirty-six known imprints of the Passy Press, four of which were discovered after the publication of Livingston's great book in 1914, may now be added another. This has been retrieved by one of the most ardent explorers in this field, Randolph G. Adams of the Clements Library. His "Passports Printed by Benjamin Franklin at his Passy Press," 1925, will be remembered as an excellent piece of work which recorded three documents then newly discovered. Indeed, in the mind of the lay collector of books, Mr. Adams is associated with all the recent discoveries of Passy imprints. Even if this be not so it is a kind of inevitable reward for bibliographic zeal in this field.

The newly discovered "imprint" is a dinner invitation [1783] the types of which conform to the reproductions on pages 103 and 105 of Livingston's book. Furthermore, Mr. Eames has pronounced the type as Franklin's Passy. That confirmation, of course, makes it unnecessary for Mr. Adams to prove his case. A portion of his little separate reprint from the October issue of the General Magazine of the University of Pennsylvania is devoted to a subject—an associated subject which will have a wider appeal and awaken a more general interest—the composition of the dinner for which Franklin printed his invitation.

The good doctor has left us in his writings some very decided views on the subject of gastronomy. His blunt statement, "People eat much more than is necessary" is familiar to all readers of his "Notes and Hints for writing a paper on what is called Catching Cold." Oysters, port and duck are esteemed particularly likely to cause trouble into the banquetter. If meat be too tough, the doctor upon one occasion remarked that possibly it could be made more tender by having electricity passed through it. To turkey he was evidently decidedly partial, as one remembers from the plea for the adoption of that bird, rather than the eagle, as the national emblem of the United States. But of all his writings on the subject of food, his essay on "Mayz, or Indian Corn" is the most worthy of the attention of those who would rather cultivate a taste for food than a taste for imprints. Roast corn, boiled corn, succotash, hominy, corn meal mush, corn bread, hoe cake, corn syrup, are only some of the ways of eating corn which Doctor Franklin solemnly considers and recommends to his readers.

THE catalogue (28) of English literature recently issued by the Brick Row Book Shop, Inc., of New Haven, Princeton and New York, is extremely attractive, and something of a novelty among the book lists of American dealers. It has an air of quaint anachronism, derived from the use of rules, and authors' names printed as sidenotes. The repetition of the same name, in many instances throughout the page, seems hardly necessary, although that repeated emphasis may have been deliberately planned.

A very broad prospect of English literature is provided by this catalogue, which is well documented, and which records the works of authors from Chaucer to Conrad. There are folios of Bacon, Jonson, Shakespeare (including the classic Four), Dryden et al.; first editions of Smollett, Fielding, Sterne, Richardson, Goldsmith, Johnson, Shelley, Lamb, Keats, Blake, Coleridge, Tennyson, Wordsworth, Dickens and the lesser fry. It is difficult, of course, to particularize from so full a list—it extends to 146 pages—for we see many pieces which are favorites and accounts of which would well fill these columns. There is an announcement in the catalogue of the proposed publication of an extremely important volume, "A Census of the Manuscripts of Oliver Goldsmith," compiled by Katharine Canby Balderston of Wellesley College. The work of Miss Balderston is certain to be authoritative and exhaustive, and this should be of inestimable value to bookmen.

Books Briefly Mentioned

MEN IN WOMEN'S GUISE. By O. . Gilbert. Translated by Robert B. Douglas. Illustrated. 284 pp. New York: Brentano's. $3.50.*

THE manja of human nature for masquerading forms the subject of this unique volume. M. Gilbert begins by saying that his book will mean something to science, but concludes with the naif remark that he wrote it to amuse himself. He has industriously searched among the archives of the seventeenth century to reanscitate the certain corpses that have not a very nice odor when uncovered. That notorious Chevalier d'Eon, whose continual change of sex puzzled all Europe, and the less extraordinary and even less worthy Abbé de Choisy, take up most of the book. But a number of eccentrics of similar mold get mention. Singers, writers, actors especially, like to defeat Nature's intention as to their sex. Sometimes the accidental discovery of a talent for posing confirms the latent talent, as in the cases of Julian Eltinge, Barbette and Ristori. The author promises another volume to succeed this. As a curious bit of biographical lore it may be worth the while for him to take the trouble—if he still wished to amuse himself.

WORK THAT IS PLAY

THE COMPLETE PLAYCRAFT BOOK. By Patten Beard. 364 pp. Illustrated. New York: The Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.*

WITH great patience and industry, Miss Patten has accumulated about every device in the way of home work for the children. To make things is childhood's great game, and with this volume for a guide there can be no end to the delightful occupation of making and furnishing doll houses, turning fruits and vegetables into miniature animals and dramatizing all the old tales in the fairy books. Why, a child will surely cry to stay home from school and work with such a book! The materials required have been carefully reduced to the simplest, cheapest form. Spools, cardboard, tiny candy boxes, &c., come within the reach of the most modest household, and the combination of these materials are infinite. "The Party Made From Almost Nothing At All" reads like a suggestion of an old génie. Verily, there are a few things under the sun, and the author of this ingenious volume has discovered some of them for the amusement of the children.

WORDS TO THE WISE

HOW TO GET AHEAD FINANCIALLY. By William A. Schneider. 172 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $2.*

THE reader who begins this book will be afraid to skip one page for fear of missing something valuable. It was Bordeaux who wrote that fearsome little romance, "The Fear of Life," but every one of us has at some time known what the fear of dependency upon others is. Perhaps it may be the fear of physical or mental dependency; nobody knows what the misery of one threatened with blindness, for instance, can be, excepting the victim. But financial insolvency is perhaps the most bitter affliction that can come to any self-respecting nature. How, then, may one escape it? Read Mr. Schneider's book if you would find out. He has touched bottom in his investigations into "Budgets," "Savings Accounts," "Paying Cash," "The Real Meaning of Thrift," &c. He wisely says that thrift is not avarice, but discreet spending. He gives statistics about life insurance, touches upon the exigent need of making your will, enters into all troubles and difficulties of the young who wish to "get ahead" but do not know how, and has some illuminating remarks to make about owning your own home. Not a long book, but a wise one.

LURE OF THE LINKS

THE FIFTH ESTATE. Thirty Years of Golf. By Jerome D. Travers and James R. Crowell. Illustrated. 250 pp. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THERE is a rare quality to the music of the links," assert the authors of this compendium of golf lore. And the remark is stoutly borne out by the many chapters having in sequence with "The Dude Era of Golf," when only young and sporty men took to it; with the "Reign of the Old Man," in which the St. Andrews Golf Club has a strong rôle and famous champions are brought in. Everybody did not know that our great game came originally from Scotland, was neglected for a century and a half among us, and was then suddenly elevated into importance again through the efforts of such men as Dr. Carr, Ten Eyck, Alec Smith and Travers himself. Besides the wonderfully invigorating effect of golf playing upon the bodily man, there seems to be a moral influence. "In Your True Self Revealed" we learn how character is strengthened by the necessity of self-control; patience acquired; accuracy and concentration developed. To the reader ignorant of this game—if there be any—revelation awaits him after a run through the book. And to the golf enthusiast it will be pure pleasure. The many excellent illustrations add lucidity to the text.

MEN ON HORSEBACK

ADVANCED EQUITATION. By Barbetto de Sousa. Illustrated. 419 pp. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.*

THE art of "riding and controlling the saddle horse with the minimum of effort and the most comfort to both concerned" is the subject of this book. If equitation can be acquired from reading, then it should be from this comprehensive volume. Every part of the subject is treated, from mounting to jumping. One becomes familiar with the feelings of the horse in every situation and learns how to manage his whimsies and opinions. Technical terms are explained, ample illustration of each suggestion given by photographs, and for the man or woman who wishes a complete manual of equitation it is to be recommended.

FAMOUS SERMONS

GREAT SERMONS OF THE WORLD. Compiled and edited by the Rev. Clarence Macartney. 586 pp. Boston: The Stratford Company. $3.50.

IN the field of religious ethics this volume, a collection of the world's greatest sermons, stands nobly unique. It covers the field from the days of Christ Himself to the modern preachers—Beecher, Phillips Brooks and George Campbell Morgan. Preceded by brief notices of the men and their work, the most notable sermon of each is given. The editor has been inspired to select the one whose moving eloquence and strong appeal make it live as if some spiritual power hovered over the words. He regrets that he has not been able to "show in mere words the thunder and lightning that made these sermons magnetic," but if proof is needed of the vitality of words the reader's sensations in reading this volume will bear testimony of their inherent power. Nothing finer has been printed for many years. The jacket of the book is of gold paper. But the content is of genuine gold.

AFRICAN ADVENTURES

WILD ANIMALS. A White Man's Conquest of the Jungle. Illustrated. By Wynant D. Hubbard. 280 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $3.

EDUCATED to be a geologist, Mr. Hubbard was borne upon that current that turns so many men toward exploration of the fascinating jungles of Africa. He became the intimate comrade of wild animals and has actually entered into their personal lives with so much zest that he is enabled to make them exceedingly intimate acquaintances of our own. His chapter on catching a "hypo" is excellent reading. And his treatment of the vital problem of conquering that pest, the tsetse fly, and consequently opening up the vast African fields to cultivation, offers food for reflection by every naturalist and agriculturist. The book abounds with anecdotes and shrewd observation, and culture as well as experience has entered into its preparation.

IN THE ROCKIES

A MOUNTAIN BOYHOOD. By Joe Mills. Illustrated. 288 pp. New York: J. H. Sears & Co. $2.*

AN adventuresome boy broke away from his parents, away back in the '60s, and plunged into the wild life of the open in the Colorado mountains. Simply, without affectation, he tells the story of his escapes from mortal perils, and records his sensations as all alone he confronts Nature's grand panorama. Every boy, and many older people, will thrill at these stories of grizzlies, of big-game hunting and the anecdotes of country amusements. There are some bits of pleasant humor in the story, and it is genuine all through.

SMALL-GAME HUNTING

SPORT IN FIELD AND FOREST. By Ozark Ripley. 180 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.*

IF the lure of life in the open with an object in view is upon you, Ozark Ripley can tell you how to get the most for your expenditure of time and powder. He has done it all himself, from the time when, a small boy, he stole away from home one night and brought back his first 'possum. He has hunted doves, deer, quail, wild turkeys and the intelligent black bear, whose spirit makes it worth a man's while to lay low and not waste his shots. The whole art or science of small-game hunting, so far as it may be learned from reading, is presented here.

A BOOK OF JOKES

LAUGHS! That Make the Whole World Seem Brighter. By Thomas L. Masson. 300 pp. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.

A CARTLOAD of funny things may be depressing. It depends upon the appetite of the fun-seeker. If one is endowed with a prodigious capacity to absorb jests in the bulk, and able to turn rapidly from a tit-bit like "Who invented the hole in the roughnut?" "Oh, some fresh air fiend, I suppose," to the lengthy discourse of Robert C. Benchley upon "Water Football," why, then, this collection of jokes will be appealing and satisfactory. Thomas L. Masson is not responsible for the invention of them; only for gathering them under one book cover. To be absolutely fair, most of them are pleasant reading. Picking out one that seems superior, we quote: "Passing the Buck." "From the Book of Job the minister had just read, 'The light of the wicked shall be put out,' when darkness descended upon the church. 'Brethren,' said the minister, with scarcely a minute's pause, 'in view of the sudden and startling fulfillment of this prophecy we will spend a few minutes in silent prayer for the electric lighting company.'"

ADVANCES IN ASTRONOMY

BEYOND THE MILKY WAY. By George Ellery Hale. With numerous illustrations. 104 pp. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.*

THE honorary director of the Wilson Observatory at Washington has prepared a short epitome of the more recent discoveries in astronomy, three of which are the fruit of his personal investigations in Egypt. The stars were primitive man's first object of interest outside of the exigent urges of hunger and sex. He ordered his life by them; reckoned time and season, obtained whatever gleams of moral uplift visited him through contemplation of that mysterious universe. In his treatment of "Astronomy in Egypt," Dr. Hale has been most luminous and intelligible. We learn why the peasants based their year upon the helical rising of Sirius, as it coincided with the uprising of the Nile. Breasted's discoveries are related, the ancestry of the telescope and men's efforts to study the heavens with their unaided eyes explained, as preliminaries to the great modern observations at Mount Wilson, with powerful telescopes. The small volume is essentially scientific and will be chiefly interesting to students of astronomy.

Archibald Marshall, whose latest novel, "The Allbrights," was published recently by Dodd, Mead & Co., has gone back to Alassio, Italy, and is engaged on a new novel to be called "That Island." The scene of the story is the Island of Wog, somewhere between England and Australia. Don't bother to look at the map. It is such a very small island that you will probably not be able to find it, even if it really exists, which we very much doubt. Novelists are always inventing islands, though why they do it when there are so many real ones to choose from is more than we can tell.

RAMBLES WITH ANATOLE FRANCE

By Sándor Kémeri
—His Last Secretary and Confidante.

Translated from the Hungarian by Emil Lengyel
Introduction by Paul-Louis Couchoud

Here is a journey that will become memorable in literary annals, adding fresh association to already famous shrines. Never has the personal charm of Anatole France been felt as in this book of his enthusiasms.

"Anatole France to the Life"
—EMILE HENRIOT in Le Temps

New York Times Book Review—
"A book which admirers of M. Bergeret (Anatole France) cannot quite afford to miss. Here are revelations—even homely revelations. Mme. Kemeri does not merely cull his wise saws, his sprightly sallies, the barbs of his wit and the audacities of his skilfull tongue. She takes notes even of his banalities. Probably her Anatole France is more like than Brousson's Anatole France."

Philadelphia Public Ledger—
"Sandor Kemeri saw him with the eyes of the poet—his great white head against the sky. She knew the profound scholar, the immortal artist, glorified by years, facing the dread and promise of death—a moving, dramatic figure before all beauty, before all life. A deeper than surface picture. Like Mr. Paine's last volume in his life of Mark Twain, in which the human being stands clear, unhampered by the pettier concerns of his youth. The glamour of his presence is over the pages of this book."

Daundering About "Auld Reekie"

James Bone Pushes His London Perambulator Along Edinburgh's Enchanted Cobbles

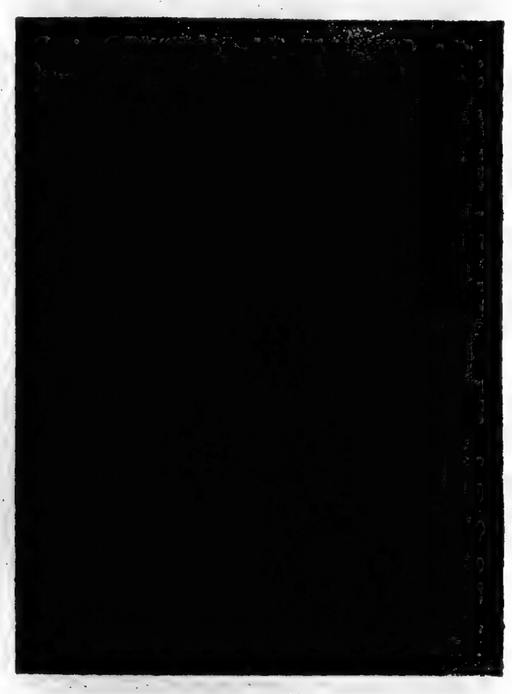
THE PERAMBULATOR IN EDINBURGH. By James Bone. Illustrated by E. S. Lumsden. 181 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $5.*

By HERBERT N. GORMAN

THE city is built against a rock which rises like some unbelievable monster from the earth and on the brow of this rock is perched the Castle. This rock is the dominating motif of Edinburgh as it is the dominating motif of James Bone's "The Perambulator in Edinburgh." Again and again this "beetling base" recurs in the descriptive passages of the writer's well-seasoned and aptly coordinated book. This is as it should be, for whoso has walked along Princes Street, Edinburgh, knows that the rock is the soul of the city. And it is the soul of the city for which Mr. Bone is striving in the eleven chapters of a book that is a calculated marriage of architectural and spiritual description. Now there have been many books about Edinburgh, books that have ranged all the way from romantic fictionalizings to the smoothly turned survey of Robert Louis Stevenson. It is a testimony to the charm, the romance, the "historical pull," as it were, and the power of enslaving and inspiring its disciples that "Auld Reekie" has nearly always come off finely in these books. Indeed, it seems almost impossible for a book on Edinburgh to fail in at least a part of its purpose. The subject carries even the poor writer away and lifts him above himself. The ghosts gather too thickly about the novelist, poet, or Grub Street scribbler for him to neglect the multitudinous facets of historical charm that reveal themselves in Edinburgh. What is a poor pot-boiler to do as he walks up the windy Canongate and senses the host of armored men and beautiful women that press forward out of the past to him? He knows these ghosts for they are a portion of his intimate dreams and his youth. The stentorian voice of John Knox, the horse of Darnley striking sparks from the cobbled courtyard of Holyrood, the masked figure of Deacon Brodie slinking through the Close, Queen Mary bathing in wine in the Canongate, Montrose breaking through the mob of Presbyterians on his way to join King Charles at Berwick, and, above all and dominating all, the slender figure of Mary Stuart bidding her fatal farewell to Chastelard, these are the ghosts that haunt the writer as he climbs the hill to the Castle and pauses beside Mons Meg to look down at the houses.

There is a good reason why the sense of the Past, with all its shapes and colors, impinges so violently upon the sensitive mind in Edinburgh, and that reason is amply indicated in Mr. Bone's book. It is mainly because the historical scene in the ancient Scots city is so compact, for one thing, and, aiding and abetting this limitation of area, is the visible aspect of the past that persists in this historically congested community. The Castle, Holyrood, the ancient streets with their high lands, the very rise and fall of the thoroughfares where the pedestrian going one way seems to walk right into the sky and the traveler bound in the other direction appears to sink into the ground, these things sharpen the mythic sense, that sense so inextricably commingled with historical memories, and one wanders along brooding over the high and thrilling heritage of Scotch romance. Above all, there is the Castle. One must return to it again and again. Having this massive stone bulk reared against the sky above their heads and always before their eyes, how can the inhabitants of Edinburgh very well escape the historical sense? The Old Town clustered about this fortress is still a slice of history.

"The Peramubiator in Edinburgh" is not the stock type of descriptive book, and yet the reader will find all the ingredients of that type here, a careful architectural and topographical analysis, comment on ancient decorations, fireplaces, doors, knockers and windows and the reincarnation of various historical figures. But animating all this and lifting what might be "the usual thing" to another plane entirely is the spirit with which Mr. Bone approaches his task. The sympathetic glow and awareness of things, the sensitive comprehension and calm relegation of the obvious to its proper place in the perspective, the idea of never quite describing the Castle but forever indicating it as the looming guardian of the past, and the abstinence of any sentimentalized maunderings about Holyrood (there isn't a mention of David Rizzio in the book), these things raise the volume to a personal expression. What Mr. Bone does do is to indicate the face and aspect of Edinburgh, to burrow into the ancient lands (those picturesque rookeries once the abode of greatness and now the "flats" of poverty) and draw forth their secrets, to sense the communal feeling, including ghostliness, and betray it discreetly enough to the reader, and to give, as it were, the sensation of that atmosphere of mingled past and present that hovers over the steep streets, tall buildings and jutting rocks. It is all done in a charming prose that is not without a certain unforced but unmistakable sense of humor. Indeed, the much-abused "mellow" might be applied to the general effect of "The Perambulator in Edinburgh." The face of Edinburgh is drawn deftly and simply by a gentle insistence on the aspects of the more important streets, the sights from the high windows of the rookeries are indicated, the Saturday afternoon recreations of the Edinburghers are outlined, and the ghosts that wander through the ancient closes are brought back to life. It is impossible, of course, to give any adequate idea of a descriptive book unless some of the description is quoted. An excellent idea of Mr. Bone's prose may be gained from a paragraph concerning Leith Walk.



An Edinburgh View.

Few things in Edinburgh [he writes] are really more astonishing than the way this great thoroughfare spurts down its steep gorge from Princes Street and gradually widens until, dammed by the little fully licensed island of buildings opposite the theatre, it seems to burst its banks and, attaining Amazonian width, rolls down the hill with terrific force, bearing tram-cars like cockle-shells on its bosom. It must be a sundering flood to timid friends who live on different sides. I could stand for hours and watch it from the bottom of Picardy Place. Its enormous scale is increased by the meagre traffic and its downward rush by the sharply diminishing perspectives of the iron lamp standards in the middle of the road. If you look long enough, it has the active fascination of a view from a precipice; your legs begin involuntarily to move, and unless you look out you will find yourself trotting. It summons up a vision of all Edinburgh some day following an irresistible impulse and pouring in a multitude down the steep faster and faster and souse into the sea!

This is the finest type of description, the type that gives the reader the whole "feel" of the scene. Mr. Bone does this time and again in his book and he does it with that guiltlessness of literary effort and effect that communicates so high a sense of power to his prose. Then for types, for individuals, take Mr. Bone's paragraph about a daunderer. Daundering, be it known, is a Saturday afternoon recreation in Edinburgh and it consists of wandering nowhere at the slowest of speed.

As he grows grayer [writes Mr. Bone] the daunderer is taken in home waters. He moves in slow tacks between shops and graveyards, of which Edinburgh offers so unequaled and queer a variety. Bookshops hold him. He picks up a book out of the Tuppenny Box, and holding it to his nose he dips into it like a gray old bird—often I have seen a row of him, like a row of herons on the foreshore, pecking very deliberately at the overflow of books that bursts from the windows of the long bookshop near Greyfriars Church and falls in little dingy cascades to near the pavement. But he does not really read more than a line or two, for he would be swelr to raise false hopes in the heart of the bookseller; so down the book goes again into the box. He wipes his spectacles, moons solemnly around and tries another. Then there are for him the graveyards, dank and sparsely grassed, heavy with whitened old tombstones, most of them on a slope over a ravine as though even the dead in Edinburgh were not to be shut out from her great views. Here there are seats and tombstones to spare for the daunderer, who sits with both hands on the horn head of his stick and beholds the world as it sinks away from him and rises again in the grey skies.

Perhaps he has a particular place in the graveyard reserved for himself when his daunders are over as soon they must be, and his name is already carved thereon like that of Stevenson's old stonemason: "Alexander Loudon, born seventeen ninety twu. Died——and then a hole in the ballant: that's me. Alexander's my name. They ca'd me Ecky when I was a boy. Eh, Ecky! Ye're a awfu' auld man?"

It should be emphasized that Mr. Bone's book is a book of people as well as a book of buildings and vistas. There is hardly a chapter that does not introduce some typical Edinburgh figure, and some of the chapters are wholly concerned with them. Whether they are New Haven fishwives or scrawny women of the lands or ancient creatures maundering about ghostlies or high-hatted lawyers walking up the steep hill to the Law Courts and having a great ado to keep their lums (Scotch slang for what the American man in the crowd delicately calls a plug hat) on in the face of the cutting east wind, they are revealed to us with dexterity and an authentic sense of character drawing. Mr. Bone plainly is acquainted with the human equation in things and it always plays a large share in his descriptive writing. He knows that half of the uniqueness of Edinburgh is concentered in the people who walk (or rather climb) its steep streets, and he makes a generous allowance for them. So the wives with their creels of cod pass up Princes Street and the lawyers continue to disregard motors when they approach the courts, while above them the Castle looms on its beetling rock and the silent mouth of Mons Meg points away over the valley. In the high rookeries the poverty-stricken women pick at the dried black soot on their fireplaces and it falls away and sculptored coats-of-arms greet the day again. The omnipresent sense of the Past that continues to have so much to do with Edinburgh hovers above this city, which, in the words of Mr. Bone, "cuts clean and brave against the clouds" like a flag. It is obvious that a wealth of affection went into the making of this book (which, by the way, is so beautifully illustrated by E. S. Lumsden in a clean-cut, old-fashioned style of draftsmanship), and this richness of sentiment comes out again to greet the reader as he refreshes his knowledge of that Northern city of romance where the great swords clanged against stone walls and the fair and fatal Queen passed through love to the headsman's block.

Conrad in the Heart of Darkness

JOSEPH CONRAD IN THE CONGO. By G. Jean-Aubry. Limited edition. 71 pp. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.*

ANOTHER and valuable addition to the lengthening list of Conradian memorabilia is G. Jean-Aubry's "Joseph Conrad in the Congo." This small volume of fewer than four-score pages, in an edition limited to 470 copies, is of documentary rather than literary importance. It will present to the casual reader of Conrad, however enthusiastic that reader, little of paramount interest. But for those who wish to add to their Conrad shelf everything pertaining to that author, the book is of importance. Mr. Jean-Aubry has searched the files of the Société du Haut-Congo, in Brussels, and found therein the correspondence between Conrad and the Director of the Society which resulted in the for ier's commission to the command of that river steamboat which figures so largely in his short stories of Africa, especially "Heart of Darkness." It will be recalled that in the telling of this masterpiece the narrative is supposed to come from the fictitious character Marlow, but although every one has known that the story was autobiographical, there was lacking proof of how completely autobiographical it was until the issuance of this brochure.

Not the least interesting feature of the correspondence assembled by Mr. Jean-Aubry—a correspondence carried on in French, by the way—is the signature of the sea captain not yet turned novelist—J. C. (or merely C.) Korzeniowski. During most, if not all of his son-going days, the man who later came to be known to the reading public as Joseph Conrad fared the oceans under the British flag (generally) but under his own Polish name. Thus suddenly made visual, the signature adds both to the drama and to the romance of Conrad's extraordinary career.

It was due not a little to his unfortunate experiences in the Congo that Conrad turned exclusively to authorship. At the same time it is folly, of course, to say, as often alleged, that the Polish-British sea captain turned to writing solely because of tropic fever contracted in Africa. Conrad, master-in-sail (and also in steam) was sadly broken in health, to be sure; but he would have become a writer had his strength and his nerves been unimpaired. An artist's destiny comes from within, not from without. The disastrous Congo experience—the wonder is that the man survived—was, however, the trigger, so to speak, that set off the charge.

It is to be hoped the libraries will avail themselves of the opportunity to acquire this collection of Conrad documents, for students who are familiar with the African diary—Conrad's only diary so far as known recently made accessible in the posthumous volume "Last Essays"—will, of course, feel that their information is incomplete without this supplementary volume.

Those Troubadours Were No Posturing Minor Poets

Raimon de Loi Strips Away the Veils of False Romance Surrounding Them

TRAILS OF THE TROUBADOURS. By Raimon de Loi. Illustrated by Giovanni Petrina. New York: The Century Company. $3.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE

THE troubadour is one of the strangest figures in history, one of the hardest for us to realise today. I mean, of course, the real historic, matter-of-fact troubadour, who was as actual a part of the life of the Middle Ages; as practical flesh and blood as, say, a chauffeur, an electrician or a traveling salesman in the life of our own time. Of course I do not mean that there was any resemblance between the troubadour and those just-mentioned ornaments of our so-called civilization; I only wish, by an extreme illustration, to emphasize the fact that one was no more a creature of imagination than the others. It is necessary to do this because the reality of the troubadour has been a good deal lost to us by the sentimentalization of later poets, through whom we have come to think of him as an effeminate, amatorious plucker of lute strings under ladies' casements; a posturing minor poet, forever singing little tortured ditties to his lady's eyebrow; a sort of pretty page with the dimpled chin, who occasionally met with rough usage at the hands of illiterate husbands in a barbarous age.

This "Lo! the sweet troubadour" fiction does great injustice to the reality; an injustice both to the troubadour himself and the age in which he lived. This injustice to both Raimon de Loi's attractive book should do no little to remove. A picture of the troubadour nearer to the truth is to be found in that figure which has haunted our imaginations since we first read about him in our English history school books—that Taillifer, who, at the Battle of Hastings, rode before the hosts of William the Conquerer, tossing his great sword into the air as he sang his Norman battle song. Symbolic not merely of the place of the poet, the minstrel, in the life of his time, Taillifer too was symbolic of the almost inconceivable difference between that time and ours. Imagine our recent great war opening in a singing contest between German and French poets—though, as one says that, one must not forget Signor D'Annunzio and the real part he has played, think of him as we may, in the practical politics of modern Italy. After all, even yet in those Latin countries from which the troubadours originally sprang, we can best understand what a troubadour meant in those times of which Raimon de Loi writes. The first thing to realise about him is that in addition to being a poet, and a skilled master in difficult meters, he was very much a man of his hands, a courageous fighter; one, indeed, who . . . wore his love like sword on thigh

And kept not all his valour for his lute.

The troubadour, however, was much more complex than this, and as well as being singer, fighter, lover, was also a political agent and what we would call a journalist. But here it will be best to quote Raimon de Loi's admirable account of his unique comprehensiveness:

> The troubadours were a comparatively small corporation of very fashionable young men. They were, for the most part, men of gentle birth. If of low birth, they were awarded, after they had attained position as a troubadour, the rights and privileges of gentleman. Richard the Lion Heart was King of England. His grandfather, William IX of Poitiers—said to have been the earliest troubadour—was both a poet and a Duke. And the hundred others—William de Foix, Bernard de Ventadour, Raymond V of Toulouse, and the rest—were all men of great power. But the social position of the troubadour is not entirely explained by the statement that he is a man of gentle birth with the talent for writing poetry who chooses Love as his theme and writes to please the ladies of the court. He performed another service which made him very valuable to the society which he graced. The troubadour was the publicity agent for the court in which he lived. Please remember that there were in those days no newspapers . . . yet as commerce and industry began to flourish and life became more and more complicated the shrewd barons of the south of France found it necessary to devise means whereby they could attract to their courts a better kind of fighting man, make alliances with more powerful neighbors, and tell the world of the power of their swords as well as of the beauty of their wives. They found the troubadours useful in solving this problem. A lady distinguished a troubadour from among many other powerful courtiers because she realised that his songs about her beauty would attract to her court many powerful nobles. . . . The troubadours were, as I have pointed out, a special group in the social organization of the Middle Ages. During the two hundred years through which they flourished (1050-1250) they founded and developed a tradition of writing and loving which when taken over by Dante and Petrarch became part of the literary code of all succeeding generations. . . . Their home was the south of France, which at that time was the centre of elegance. They wandered from court to court praising the ladies, disseminating gossip, and carrying out the complicated work of free lance journalist, advertising agent, ambassador and warrior.

Of the world in which the troubadour played this highly important, difficult and dangerous part Raimon de Loi gives a robustly unsentimental, though far from unsympathetic account, an account by which true romance, whose essence is reality, gains rather than loses. "Because we knew little about the people of the Middle Ages," he says, "we were led to assume that they knew little about anything; because most of them could not write, we have been led to assume that they could not think or that their thought was simple and childish."

'Tis true, 'tis pity, that "they blew their noses on their sleeves, ate with their knives and fingers, spat on the floor, slept without pajamas, spoke in loud voices, killed without mercy, were lacking in what we like to call a sense of proper decency, and in general behaved in a manner which would shock a Billingsgate fishwife;" yet "the people of the Middle Ages were wise beyond their years and ours, and because their thinking was frequently as direct as a child's it had moments of shattering lucidity." Mr. De Loi, in thus rudely stripping the veils of false romance from the period, makes us feel, however, by many a shrewd side thrust at our "so-called" twentieth century, that

Castle of Falaise, Where William the Conqueror Was Born.

open plumbing and other such forms of "progress" is not all.

> The twelfth century [he says] was interested in the salvation of both the flesh and the spirit. . . . We of the twentieth century, fascinated by our sudden ability to Develop great physical power, have forgotten the meaning of the term "cultivation." . . . Since we are no longer interested in the spirit, we have discarded the spirit or explained it away. Religion and love have been reduced to the sexual impulse. We have been tamed to civilization, and our civilization has therefore become tame. Because Bertrand de Born and his friends believed in the real existence of the flesh and the real existence of the spirit and were concerned with the simultaneous salvation of both, they found time, in a life which averaged about half the years our lives average, to achieve this despite physical conditions which would enervate the best athlete we can produce.

It will be seen from these quotations that Mr. De Loi brings to his "romantic" subject the insight of a realistic philosopher, as his book on every hand proves him deeply and humanly read in the history of his period, as well as possessing dramatic gifts of characterization and narration which might well make him an admirable historical novelist. I know nothing so good since Maurice Hewlett's "Richard Yea-and-Nay" as his retelling of the story of Henry II, Queen Eleanor, and their masterful sons, all strong, vivid and terrible figures, in whose drama troubadours scarcely less strong, vivid and terrible themselves played such forceful parts. His account of the last days of Henry II, "the fat old king" whom only his sons could at last break, is a piece of history splendidly and movingly retold, while his portrait of Queen Eleanor is something like a masterpiece of historical re-creation. His manner of dealing with his stormy, heraldically vivid and often lovely material is happily conceived. He very evidently knows thoroughly and loves deeply the soil of France, and his method has been to trace on foot, in company with "The Lady Who Married Me," the trails of those great troubadours on their singing pilgrimages from south to north, east and west, west and east, in the retinues of kings (sometimes kings themselves) and queens, "servants and singers" of great ladies queens also in all but name, trails some of which he has traced for the first time.

Where they wandered, let us wander [said these two pilgrims for whom we are indebted for this charming record]; where they loved, let us love; where they sang, let us sing. Let us get into direct contact with the mystic earth that bore them. Let us feel with our hands the rough stones of the towers from which they threatened to throw themselves and penetrate the secret portals which still open inward on lovely gardens where they entered to find happiness or, in some cases, death.

It was a scheme conceived in the very spirit of the troubadours themselves, and one cannot help suspecting that for the occasion Mr. "Raimon de Loi" has assumed a name by which he is not known to his fellows in this twentieth century, a "golden singing coat" of anonimity worn expressly for his pilgrimage. Thus, he says, "we trod trails in Southern France that few tourists have ever trod, and we saw cities that few tourists have ever seen"; and thus, incidentally, Mr. De Loi gives us pictures of haunted byways of France which will, perhaps, be particularly valued by those who have trodden some of these moonlit trails for themselves, to whom the strange dead city of Les Beaux come upon in a ghostly twilight, remains like a dream from another world, and whose feet likewise have taken them to that blue grotto of Vaucluse, sacred to the memory of Petrarch and his Laura. Bernard de Ventadour, Gauceim Faidit, Peire Vidal, Jaufre Rudel, Annant de Marcuil, Guilhem de Caliestrauh (whose heart, torn out by a jealous husband, was eaten unawares by the lady who loved him not wisely, and who found it so sweet that she would eat of no other food again forevermore), Bertrand de Born; all these live again, and more vividly than in any recent pages, in Mr. De Loi's book. Also, he occasionally gives us translations from their poems which rarely capture the spirit of the originals. Here is an example from Bertrand de Born, whose "sirventes" put fear into the hearts of princes:

With gaily colored helm and spear
And freshly gallohad shield
The knights ride in from far and near
And hold their ground.
And scorn to yield;
And the horses in thunder
Drag fallen riders through the field.
The Aquitanian castles reel
With the battle's thunder,
And all the vassals in the fray
And all the true knights wonder
How many heads they'll break this day.

I do not love my ease and meat,
A soft bed, and good food to eat
As well as when on chargers fleet
Armies latest on battle meet
And riderless horses scream. . . .

Then shouts of hate and oaths resound,
Foemen's bodies carpet the ground.
And many a brave one goes to rest
With a long spear growing in his chest
And riderless horses scream.

"The Thibaults" Is a Powerful Novel

THE THIBAULTS. By Roger Martin du Gard. Translated from the French by Madeleine Boyd. 631 pp. 2 vols., boxed. New York: Boni & Liveright. $5.

THE innovation of planning out novels to run for eight or ten volumes and publishing them in instalments of two or four, may or may not be designed to meet a new tendency on the part of readers. But it certainly imposes a new problem on reviewers. The habit of looking for a conclusive last chapter is hard to overcome. If the author new-style may plead that it does injustice to the unhurried tempo he has chosen at which to develop his theme, the reviewer may with equal reason claim that judging Hercules by one foot is a chancy exercise of any critical faculty he may possess. That the difficulty is by no means imaginary was proved lately in England, where the issue of the complete mental meanderings of William Clissold in two parts, separated by an interval of some weeks, drew forth abundant complaints from the reviewing brotherhood. Of "The Thibaults" by Roger Martin du Gard, the immediate case in point, nothing more definite is told us than that two additional volumes are "promised immediately in France." No estimate of its value as a work of art would be worth giving if it did not take note that as the present generous instalment of over 600 pages does little more than raise the foundations of the structure well above the ground, the said notice has to be of a provisional character.

Jacques Thibault and Daniel de Fontanin are schoolfellows of what would be termed here high school age, who develop one of those mutual passions into which the coarse mind reads unutterable perversities, and who, acting upon the sheer instinct of getting away somewhere together, leave home without any word to their anxious elders. They are traced and brought home. Their luck has been very uneven. Daniel, by chance, has been inducted into mysteries of sex during his escapades. He finds a tactful widowed mother awaiting his return, quite ready to accept his explanation, and settles down into a rather fatuous caree of gallantry. Poor Jacques, on the other hand, is overtaken by catastrophe. There can hardly ever have been a more hateful picture drawn of the bigot and tyrant than that of Thibault père. What M. du Gard's religious profession may be it is a matter unknown to the present writer, but there is no doubt that in making the de Fontanin family Protestant, with leanings to Christian Science, and in showing us the Thibaults as Catholics of a peculiarly petty, obscurantist and priest-ridden type, some intention, not connected altogether with art, has been at work.

Thibault is the founder of a reformatory for wayward boys—a prison with old soldiers of bad moral character as its warders. Nothing better occurs to him than to send his headstrong son to this hell-on-earth. He is only rescued from its dangers and infamies through the determination of an older brother Antoine, who is a doctor of medicine, with broken will, sodden nerves and a stain upon his memory that it will take years to efface.

In the second volume "The Springtime of Life" we find Jacques and Antoine living together and follow various manoeuvres of a realistic nature inaugurated by the elder to break down the inhibitions of the younger, which are a legacy from his terrible experience at the Thibault Foundation. Daniel has become an habitué of a cabaret known as "Packmella," which is frequented by the strange human fauna, male and female, already familiar to the outside world through the "esprit" of M. Paul Morand, and introduces his old friend to its fascinations, for which the bitter young idealist experiences only a vague feeling of disgust and disquiet.

"The Thibaults" is a very powerful novel, for all its looseknit and episodic action, a style upon whose necks the reins seem to lie loose, and that exacerbated psychology which gives the vague sense of some intolerable grievance of memory lying behind the bitter words. It contains a great deal that reads like the hysteria of sex-consciousness and some passages disconcerting in their cold and deliberate sensuality.

RECOLLECTIONS DIPLOMATIC AND UNDIPLOMATIC
By HERBERT W. BOWEN

The author tells of the many distinguished men and women he met, and of many social and literary functions in New York, Brooklyn, Washington, London, Paris, Barcelona, Madrid, and in his Woodstock country home, where his father entertained four Presidents and numerous statesmen and poets.

Mr. Bowen was appointed United States Consul to Barcelona, Spain, by President Harrison, in 1890, and was promoted by President Cleveland to be Consul-General in 1893. President McKinley sent him in 1897 as Minister-Resident to Persia, and then transferred him in 1901, as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Venezuela.

The Man of Genius

course, seen the Christ with its own eyes. Medieval art arrayed Jesus and His mother in royal and ecclesiastical vestments which in the flesh they never wore. But Mr. Middleton Murry's plea appears to be that all of the re-created Christs hitherto have been fiction. This is his view of the Fourth Gospel itself. Why, then, is Mr. Middleton Murry's Christ to be the only one that is not fiction?

Whoever may have been the writer of the Fourth Gospel, he was nearer the sources of information, as our author admits, than he is himself. If, then, Mr. Middleton Murry dismisses the historicity of St. John, may not the critics of tomorrow dismiss the historicity of Mr. Middleton Murry?

Two deeper issues arise. Mr. Middleton Murry commits himself to the declaration that Jesus sinned. He bases this somewhat grave accusation, not on evidence, but on the theory that otherwise Jesus would not have submitted to baptism "for the remission of sins." That the point was put to Jesus by John the Baptist is here, surely, pertinent. And the answer of Jesus does not bear out Mr. Middleton Murry's deduction. The reason for the act was "a fulfillment of all righteousness"—that fulfillment of the law which is elsewhere defined as love and as such is the exact reverse of the suggested obliquity. And it was Jesus Himself who later asked, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" The sinlessness of Christ is a dogma on which every man must decide for himself. But that Christ ever pleaded guilty to sin is a statement on which Mr. Middleton Murry has produced no evidence.

The second of these deeper issues arises out of Mr. Middleton Murry's own mysticism, "Much of my life," says he, "has been spent in the effort to understand men of genius." And he is sarcastic over clergy, including bishops, who belittle the personality around which alone is gathered their Church. As a mystic, therefore, Mr. Middleton Murry stands in awe before the astounding coincidence by which Jesus died on the cross at the very moment of the great day of atonement when the sacrifice was slain in the temple. In the historicity of this coincidence he believes as firmly as did Mr. Moody on one side and St. Francis of Assisi on the other. He concludes, then, that Jesus predetermined not only his own death but the very minute when it was to happen. In other words, the Crucifixion was a climax that Jesus himself brought about. What orthodoxy attributes to a divine and an eternal destiny is thus compressed, as it were, into an attempt by a lonely idealist to commit a constructive suicide at the hands of the Roman power.

The method pursued by Jesus was, as Mr. Middleton Murry discerns it, manifest. In some way which is not made clear to us, he tempted Judas Iscariot to play the traitor. The Crucifixion was thus an act of collusion between the Christ and the apostle whom he called "the son of perdition."

To Mr. Middleton Murry, Jesus was a man of the genus which is narrowly separated from insanity. Nor is it easy to imagine a more horrible spectacle than such a teacher playing the agent provocateur to one of his own intimate friends.

What astonishes us—if we may speak frankly—is the naïveté of the writer, who, on one page, can enunciate such a theory of moral and mental perversion, and on another page can claim for the moral and mental pervert those honors which are almost, if not quite, to be described as divine. A hideous obsession by a distraught and defeated teacher is to be adored as the highest of which our race is capable. We will only submit that in this ingenious adaptation of the historicity of Christ there will be found no basis on which mankind as a whole will be willing to rest a final judgment.

The churches, with their faith in Jesus, may be or may not be right. Their case continues to be submitted to the private judgment in all nations. Its strength and its weakness will be revealed by time. For the moment, however, it is open to the churches to claim that no argument on their behalf could be so convincing as the spectacle of what happens when the cleverest of men and women put down on paper their idea of a substitute Christ who shall satisfy the dictates of reason. Modernism, taking the initiative, has to submit to cross-examination and emerges not unscathed.

Whether there is a clue to the Christ, it is not for us to say. It is possible, however, that if all his words and deeds were to be referred to the one impulse of love, expressed in antipathy as well as sympathy, in justice as well as mercy, in strength as well as suffering, the contrarieties would be harmonized, human with divine, since for love there has been written a synonym not less simple—namely, God.

Brief Reviews

Nathan Söderblom the Lutheran, Edgar Young Mullins the Baptist, Frank Mason North the Methodist, Charles Edward Jefferson the Congregationalist and Samuel McChord Crothers the Unitarian.

It is noteworthy that in each case the writer is less concerned with expounding and justifying the creed of his Church than he is with explaining his personal faith. What each one aims to do is to make clear his own personal attitude toward those matters of mind and heart that are usually blanketed under the term religion. Somewhat personal in the tenor of its exposition also is Dean Inge's brilliant introduction on "The Future of Christianity," which serves as a sort of unifying agent for all these diverse faiths. Objectively, he follows the development of Christianity from its Asiatic origin to its present status as the religion of the Occident and of the dominant races, and ends with the comment, "Nations get the religions they deserve and the future of the white races is not secure." Nevertheless, he has "not the slightest fear that the light kindled in Galilee will ever be put out" and he expects Christianity to become what Jesus preached, "the pure religion of the Spirit."

OUTLINE OF MUSIC

MISS MORSE has been for years a successful teacher of music in Boston, and, her experience having taught her the need for such a work, she has prepared this book for the purpose of meeting the desire of beginners in the study of music and the less well-informed of its lovers for a simplified presentation of its development. In her introductory note she sets forth with admirable clarity the reasons why it is necessary for not only the creative and the interpretative artist to understand the underlying laws of music, or of any art, but also for any one who wishes to derive from it full enjoyment. And the first essential of that understanding, she thinks, is some knowledge of the evolution of the art. Her survey begins with the primitive music of the ancient peoples of Egypt, India, China, the Assyrians and the Hebrews and the music of the negroes and the American Indians. Then she follows the story of its development through Greece and Rome and the early Christian Church, the Middle Ages, the minstrels and troubadours, and so on to the beginnings and through the history of opera, oratorio, orchestra, organ, piano and violin, with a chapter devoted to Russian and French influences and the new movement in music. In the second section are seventeen brief biographies of famous musicians, from Bach to MacDowell. In the chapter on MacDowell there is mention in a sentence or two each of a number of other American musicians.

In so comprehensive a survey it is inevitable that each factor should be treated briefly and simply. And, in fact, the particular merit of the book lies in the simplicity with which it presents its great mass of material and the skill with which that material has been organized into logical development. It is intended for the use of beginners in the study of either the creation, the interpretation or the enjoyment of music and for their needs it is an admirable presentation, clear, closely knit together and very readable, of the outlines of musical history.

Light Fingers

Frank Lord has developed in a quite astounding manner a gift of originality in phrasing that makes Light Fingers a delightful and variegated book. His style has a touch of the brilliancy of George Meredith.

The whole novel is fused and elevated by its author's personality. It is a story of crime and punishment, of love and suffering, of endeavor and failure, all taking place in the world of the shoplifter.

We welcome a literary imagination so wise, so penetratingly kind and yet delightfully humorous.

The author has told us about human beings, weak many of them, unrighteous several of them, but absurdly and tenderly loving, most of them.

Sit back and ponder over the author's gift of style which ought to preserve this unique story. It is a style wholly his own. Nor can there be imitators of it.—Dorothy Foster Gilman in Boston Transcript. $2.00

MORE NEGRO SPIRITUALS

THE SECOND BOOK OF NEGRO SPIRITUALS. Edited, with an introduction, by James Weldon Johnson. Musical arrangements by J. Rosamond Johnson. 130 pp. New York: The Viking Press. $3.50.

THE success achieved last year by "The Book of American Negro Spirituals" deserves to be repeated by this new, second volume edited and arranged by the same gifted brothers who gave its predecessor to the world. It contains sixty-one spirituals that for reasons of space were omitted from the first book, all of them old favorites. James Weldon Johnson says in his interesting preface that "it would almost seem that the number of beautiful spirituals is inexhaustible," and he intimates that he and his brother are endeavoring to collect and preserve in permanent form all of these folksongs that it is now possible to save from oblivion. He fears that much of this music has already been lost beyond hope of retrieval and he adds that "the negro and the world are lucky in that so great a mass of his songs has been saved." Mr. Johnson's long preface is an illuminating discussion of the part the spirituals have played in the life of the negro and of their value and influence in his development and in the art of the nation. This leads him on to a brief statement of the contribution of the negro race to American culture, a swift survey that is restrained, keenly interesting and suggestive. Then, taking a glance at the future of the spirituals as a force in music, he sees in "this nobler music of the negro" such an unexplored mine of rich materials for serious composers as they could not find elsewhere. Mr. Johnson's preface is well worth the reading of any one interested in either American music, the achievements of the colored race in America or the sources of American culture.

Among the songs included are: "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child," "Walk Together Children," "Zekiel Saw de Wheel," "Same Train," "Gimme Yo' Han'" and the familiar version of "Nobody Knows de Trouble I See," of which the first book contains a rare form. J. Rosamond Johnson, well known to concert goers throughout the country, has made, as before, the arrangements for voice and piano with skill and taste. The brothers Johnson are doing a work of such value in the preservation of these songs as to merit the heartiest commendation of music lovers and of all who are interested in American culture.

EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH

OUR MOBILE EARTH. By Reginald Aldworth Daly. Illustrated. 342 pp. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

THE head of Harvard University's Department of Geology has written a luminous and dramatic, and therefore very readable, account of the evolution and present status of our earth as a ball of matter that is scientifically accurate and thoroughly up to date. It is just the book for the average reader who wants modern, dependable information about accepted and also still discussed theories on how the earth came into being and what is now happening to it. But the professional geologist and other scientists will find in it many pages that will be full of meat for them. It is not the solid, stolid earth of rock-mass nor the eloquent earth of rock-strata of which Professor Daly writes, but the earth that quivers and shakes and is convulsed, that is bent and shaped by inner and outer forces, whose surface, perhaps, creeps and floats and slides—in short, his theme is the mobility that not only in its infancy was a characteristic, but is still one of its outstanding features.

And so he writes of earthquakes and volcanoes, what causes them and what they do to the globe, of that mystery, the earth's interior, about which the scientist can only speculate as he theorizes on the data he collects, of the distortion to which the earth's form has been subjected and its significance, of mountain ranges and their origin and, finally, of the earth's superficial aspect and what influences have wrought upon it and what forces are still molding and shaping it.

In this last chapter recent theories are especially to the fore, although in every subject the latest data and latest theorizing upon it are cited and discussed. In the final chapter much attention is paid to the theory recently advanced by the German geologist, Alfred Wegener, that the continental masses have come to their present location by slowly floating on the surface of the inner mass and are still in motion. The theory is much argued and extensive experiments have recently been started for its testing. Professor Daly discusses it at length and without any sign of prejudice against it. His own conception of the earth as a mobile mass predisposes him to take a favorable viewpoint and he adds some interesting suggestions that extend and clarify the thesis. He shows also that Wegener was not the first to hold this conception, but that it was first announced by an American geologist, Frank B. Taylor, while even before him an Austrian, Eduard Suess, had broached the idea that the Himalayan range had been formed by the southward sliding of the Asian continent. To the man in the street who has kept up with the magic strides modern geology has been taking its conception of the earth as something as trembling and unstable as a lump of mud will be a bit startling, but if he wants to find out about it he can hardly find the subject more competently, more clearly and more interestingly presented than in this book.

PRIMITIVE EDUCATION

ORIGINS OF EDUCATION AMONG PRIMITIVE PEOPLES: A Comparative Study in Racial Development. By W. D. Hambly. Preface by Charles Hose. Illustrated. 432 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company.

WORLDWIDE research by scientific methods and scholarly collation, discussion and comparison of the immense amount of material brought together have gone into the making of this impressive volume by Mr. Hambly, an English anthropologist of note and author of several previous books. His purpose is by thus assembling comprehensive data on the customs of primitive peoples in preparing their offspring for the duties of life, to help resolve some of the problems in the history of man's development and to aid administrators of the British Empire, missionaries and others who are brought into contact with such undeveloped peoples, to understand the customs and the psychology with which they must deal.

The author studies the general education of both boys and girls to prepare them for tribal life, the training of each for their specialized functions, the various methods of giving moral training to primitive children and the general subject of child welfare in connection with the decline of primitive races. His book is made much more interesting to the general reader, as well as more illuminating in every way, by his habit throughout of showing the purpose of each primitive method in the rearing of children, and its adaptation to the environment and the level of development and of bringing out parallels and similarities with civilized customs. For the student of sociology the book is full of facts and suggestions that are informing and stimulating to thought. There is an extensive bibliography, while the copious illustrations from primitive life in all parts of the world add much interest.

A SYMPOSIUM OF CREEDS

TWELVE MODERN APOSTLES AND THEIR CREEDS. By Gilbert K. Chesterton, Bishop Charles L. Slattery, Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin and Others. Introduction by the Right Rev. William Ralph Inge. 209 pp. New York: Duffield & Co. $2.50.

TWELVE well-known men here explain and justify the religious faith which they hold—their several conceptions of life and spirit as related to ideas of God, the meaning of the universe, the mystery of the soul, man's place in the procession of life. The series leads off with Mr. Chesterton's account of why he is a Catholic and ends with Carl Van Doren's explanation of why he is an unbeliever. Senator Reed Smoot justifies his faith as a Mormon and Clifford Smith his as a Christian Scientist, while Rufus Matthews Jones expounds his convictions as a Quaker. Bishop Slattery upholds the Episcopalian belief, Dr. Coffin the Presbyterian,

TWELVE MODERN APOSTLES AND THEIR CREEDS

Introduced by Dean Inge, who writes on "The Future of Christianity," this volume contains some of the most outspoken opinions and confessions of various creeds, not only by governors of the church, but also by some of the distinguished laity.

The contributors to this frank symposium are:

Dr. Samuel McChord Crothers (Unitarian); Dr. Edgar Young Mullins (Baptist); G. K. Chesterton (Catholic); Dr. Charles E. Jefferson (Congregationalist); Bishop Charles L. Violet Hunt Was In at the Death of the "Mot Juste"

I HAVE THIS TO SAY. The Story of My Flurried Years. By Violet Hunt. 326 pp. Illustrated. New York: Boni & Liveright. $3.50.

By JOHN CARTER

FOR all its flurried, turbulent style, for all its réchauffé of stale literary gossip and for all its morbid dissection of a concluded love affair, there is something about Violet Hunt's story of her life from 1908 to 1918 which makes it memorable. To seek the snows of yesteryear is a thankless task; to spill cold beans is a tepid achievement; but to record the death throes of a brilliant and fruitful movement in English literature—this is something different. Out of her highly personal account of her relations with Ford Madox Hueffer (now Ford Madox Ford) and of her litigation with her relatives and with Mrs. Hueffer, emerges a vivid, headstrong, enthusiastic personality. "I am under Scorpio," she says, "the star of artists and harum-scarum people generally." She was nurtured in the milk of the pre-Raphaelite tradition. When she was a little girl the Fin de Siècle movement was in full swing. In 1908, when she resumed her old acquaintanceship with Mr. Hueffer, the English Review had just been launched, with the backing of Joseph Conrad and H. G. Wells, and all literary England was engaged, under the involute inspiration of Henry James, in the hunting of that Snark, the mot juste.

Her narrative, therefore, takes the form of an account of the decline and fall of le mot juste; she was in at the death of a literary style, for "the war has killed le mot juste," that fetich of technical perfection which did not survive the flurried years of 1914-18. She lived in the heart of literary England long enough to see the Review sold to Alfred Mond and to join Wyndham Lewis in the Vorticist movement, that English appendage to the method which began with Impressionism, then moved through the phases of Post-Impressionism, Cubism and Futurism, and has now fallen down of its own weight in the bifurcations of Dadaism and Expressionism.

The more intimate aspects of her narrative she is estopped from developing. Having been advised in her girlhood by John Ruskin to "find some one you can trust and then count no sacrifice too great to make in that one's service," she found that her fate led her to Ford Madox Hueffer, a Catholic, living in separation from his wife. "To vouchsafe the whole truth at this juncture," she says, "would, I am told, land me in prison for three months without the option of a fine." However, the inclusion, as an appendix, of the newspaper accounts of Mrs. Hueffer's suit in 1925, to prevent Miss Hunt from signing herself as Violet Hunt Hueffer, coupled with the latter's forthright statement, "I never did become a legal wife," tells the story pretty effectively. Incidentally, her account of her relations with the brilliant editor and author and of the legal tangles in which they involved her paints a telling picture of the power of family law to disintegrate romance. In her envoi comes the pathetic announcement: "And Joseph Leopold [her name for Ford Madox Ford] wanders, wanders, among the fleurs de luce of the Castle of Beaucaire with another, hardier, sturdier Egeria." And in her preface she warns all young maids against that cruel monster known as love. Let them take liking with a small "l," not Love with a big one, she urges, and argues for that loyalty in "loving kindness," for "some absurd fetich of endurance, some catchword," which will hold lovers together after Love has departed.

"I Have This to Say" will bear wounds in diverse directions. It comes from too near to the heart of pain not to cause pangs in the hearts of those who have known its author intimately or have been protagonists in her ghastly struggle against litigious relatives and persecuting Grundys. English society has had its sport with her heart and life; let it now wince at the sight of the wounds it has inflicted.

To an American public, however, the greater interest will attach to the picture of the heart of literary London during one of those great and glorious failures. Violet Hunt was predestined from birth to take part in the forlorn hope which induced Hueffer to publish the English Review. Her mother had been the friend of Robert Browning, of all the Rossettis, of Ruskin and of Ford Madox Brown. As a girl, George Du Maurier had drawn her for Punch, and had brought up to her home in Whitby Jane Russell Lowell, Henry Irving and Charlie Phelps. When she was in her 'teens Oscar Wilde had lisped to her, "Oh, Miss Violet, think of a map drawn of a whole continent, and besides the names of an insignificant city or two, three words: Hic sunt leones! Oh, Miss Violet, let you and me go there." Rennell Rodd, the indignant diplomat who recently repudiated his alleged authorship of "The Whispering Gallery," was a dancing partner of hers. Alfred Mond was a warm friend, and in 1908 when she asked H. G. Wells for advice on three stories she had written, he referred her to the Review. In less than a year she was virtually managing it. Her account of the birth of this venture is most entertaining.

Of course they were tiresome. They sat up all night and every night, choosing words, drinking strong coffee, which wives, sitting up too, have to make. They wrote in every room in the house, completely dressed or not, as they pleased, or as the fury of composition permitted. If people did not like seeing them in the garden in their bathrobes people must look the other way or do without the Review and, if the bathroom was considered a better study than the parlor, people must wait to wash until the divine furor had passed away. Mrs. Conrad jibbed at the loss of the bathroom at Someries, so she says. • • • Never, surely in England, was there such a reversion to the ideas, such an upholding of the tenets of chivalry as was implied in the terms of the agreement entered into by men who, after all, had wives and children to keep.

With the benevolent support of Thomas Hardy, Henry James and W. H. Hudson, with Conrad and Wells deeply involved, the Review quickly became an artistic success and a financial failure. It attracted all the literary who's: May Sinclair, Hilaire Belloc, Willa Cather and S. S. McClure (who might have bought it instead of Mond). Arnold Bennett, Northcliffe, Norman Douglas, Gilbert Cannan, John Galsworthy, Lawrence Housman, Percival Gibbon, Wyndham Lewis and all. The tale of how Hueffer discovered D. H. Lawrence, then an obscure schoolmaster in the midlands, is a tale which justifies any financial failure. It is too well told and too long to be reproduced outside of its context.

In all this world of the now great and then aspiring, Violet Hunt lived and moved as one to the manner born. She collaborated with Andrew Lang in a poem called "Lovers in London." She observes casually, "We traveled down with Thomas Hardy, Mrs. Belloc Lowndes and a small Persian kitten." "At one of these [parties] I had the felicity of introducing Miss Christabel Pankhurst to Mrs. Humphry Ward." She is involved in the "Votes for Women" campaign. She offends Conrad by arguing that Marie Antoinette was a traitor to France. His fist struck the table.

Conrad had said, his eyes darting fire—a blue shade seeming to play about his chin: "I believe in the divine right of kings."

There is not space to reproduce all the incidents and apercus of the last years of the reign of le mot juste. A few scattered quotations should suffice to indicate both the depth and breadth of Miss Hunt's grasp upon this epoch which was about to disappear forever in the thud of drums and the hum of Zeppelins. As it is for this that her book will be most valued, it is scarcely fair to hold her to small compass, yet so numerous have been her friends that there is no alternative.

In all my days and the intercourse with wise and interesting men that they have brought me I have met and known none wiser than Arnold Bennett. • • • He told me he wrote four books a year. One shocker, two populars and one to please himself.

Conrad and James were, more or less, our mentors—interchangeable. They both sermonized us both. I had known Henry James longer than the editor [Hueffer] had, but he had the advantage of me as regards Conrad, and I think he loved Conrad more than I loved James. Henry James was kinder, less selfish; Conrad was cruder and more lovable. • • • I think I should call him [Henry James] a literary flirt. He was a tall, rather thick-set man with a black beard and olive-colored skin—the word dyspepsia written all over the cover of him.

One knew that the one thing Henry really dreaded was being mixed up with life in any way or entangled in anything that went on outside the drawing room door • • • this Gossip of Ages, this dear Old Man of the Sea, waiting to be fed with on dits, salted almonds, plums of scandal from the universal table of society. • • •

The editor [Ford Madox Hueffer], the best editor, quia editor, that has ever been. • • • He seemed like an infant in charge of a [motor] car. • • •

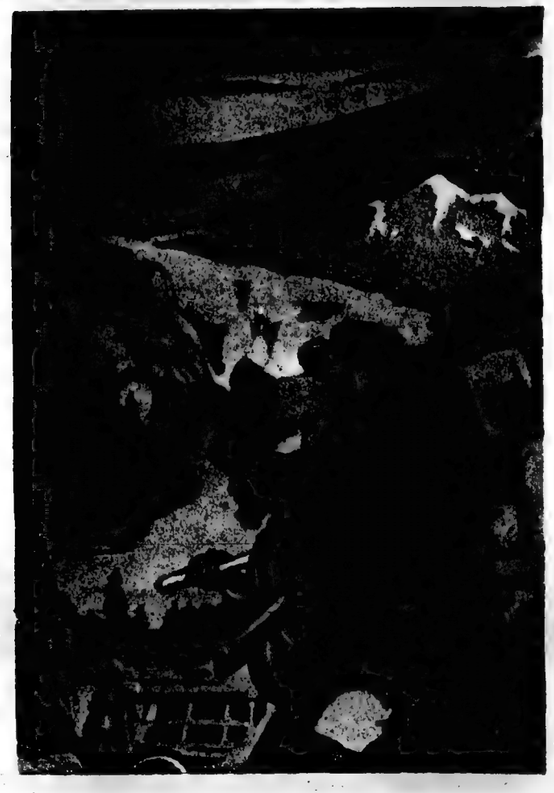
Though guileless, she [Rebecca West] is discreet; though frank withdrawn. Deep as the sea, yet adorably frivolous. A good gossip, but no mischief-maker. Devilish well informed and yet très femme—and that also is very like George Sand. • • • Like the cat, she walks alone in the serried lines and groves of technique. • • •

His [Hudson's] beauty—I use the word in the sense of that dominating, all-over excellence which may characterize all men and women so favoured of the gods—was implicit in the whole of his being. • • • If, as we have it, all men suggest likeness to some animal, one might figure him some bird pressing forward against a gale; his profile and his hair, even, had a wind-blown, backward sweep.

Ah, well! "Of the far-flung battle-front of the English Review, its authors, backers and helpers, some survive and Some Do Not." Here is their story and here their epitaph, written by a former dweller in Arcady, whose heart cannot be cured by all the antics of the neo-Georgians.

When the Frontier Kept Moving

Three Books That Resurrect the Indian Wars, Ranching Days and The Old Boundary Fights



From the Jacket Design for "The Romance of the Boundaries."

SOLDIERS OF THE PLAINS. By P. E. Byrne. 260 pp. New York: Minton, Balch & Co. $2.50.

LAST MEMORIES OF A TENDERFOOT. By R. B. Townsend. Illustrated. 270 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.50.

THE ROMANCE OF THE BOUNDARIES. By John T. Faris. Illustrated. 331 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $6.

"SOLDIERS OF THE PLAINS" is devoted to one small phase of that long, sad saga of the American Indian, the story of his struggle against the conquering white race. It is one of the grotesque ironies of the American adventure that we did not begin to appreciate the Indian until we had almost killed him off. Four or five decades ago the Western pioneer, plainsman and soldier were all agreed that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian." Mr. Byrne, who lives in North Dakota and has given much painstaking research to the matter, deals with only one side of Indian character and achievement, his ability as a fighting man, and gives to him in that respect high praise, not only for courage and effectiveness in combat, but for the intelligence and skill in campaign and battle that transcend mere fighting ability. The accounts of the Indian wars in the Northwest during the dozen years from 1866 to 1877, when the red man was making his last stand for the last vestige remaining to him of the continent which had once been his, are the sources from which Mr. Byrne has taken the material of his book.

Much of his narrative and argument is quoted from authorities upon the campaigns, battles and Indian leaders of that struggle, but he has done something very much worth while in thus bringing together such an imposing body of testimony to the martial qualities of the Indian. His work helps to put the Indian into the light in which he is entitled to be studied, his own view of the situation, and to show with justice to him his reaction to its demands. The long war trail of those years reached its culmination in the famous battle of the Little Big Horn, in June, 1876, and the utter destruction of Custer and his troops. Mr. Byrne follows that trail in several chapters which deal with the history of the making and breaking of treaties with the Indians by the whites and with some of the important military developments of the time before the Little Big Horn disaster. He gives much attention to Custer's campaign, with some analysis of his personality as a background.

Other chapters show the military handicaps under which the Indians fought, especially their dependence upon the enemy for the tools of war, their efficiency and their fortitude. There are some interesting speculations, from both the Indian and the white viewpoint, as to what might have been the result of the Custer campaign if conditions had been a little different. If the Ogallala chief, Crazy Horse, had been the leader instead of Gall the Uncpapa the author thinks that the forces of Reno and Gibbon would have met the destruction that overwhelmed Custer. Crazy Horse, he says, and quotes many others to substantiate him, was a great cavalry leader, while the Indians who fought at the Little Big Horn were, as fighters of the plains, "the greatest mounted fighters of all time." A chapter on the retreat of Chief Joseph of the Nez Percés tells the story of that famous military action with regard to its tragedy, pathos, heroism and martial ability. It was, says the author, and quotes military leaders among the whites as agreeing with him, "a military retreat which deserves to be remembered with that of Xenophon's ten thousand."

R. B. Townsend will be remembered by those who read his two previous books, "A Tenderfoot in Colorado" and "A Tenderfoot in New Mexico," as a vivid and interesting writer about early days in the Rocky Mountain region. He went there as a young man in 1870 and lived on the frontier for a number of years, cattle ranching for the most part, but seeing as much of the country, the people and the life as he could in various ways. He returned to his home in England, but came back in 1903 to revisit the scenes where he had spent so happily the years of his young manhood. He died last year, and his widow has collected some of his writing not heretofore published for this posthumous book of "Last Memories."

The greater part of the volume is devoted to accounts of his revisiting trip and comparisons with the same scenes and people thirty years before. But even these now take on the glamour of "days of old," for the infant years of our twentieth century already begin to seem antediluvian, so rapid is the pace we have gone since then. He marvels much as he tells about his visits to the New Mexican towns he had known in the 1870s, at the changes that had taken place in thirty years.

There are some amusing tales of his early experiences in Colorado, and at least two chapters that, besides being interesting to the ordinary reader, offer good material to the student of animal psychology.

Any one who cares for accounts of the pioneer life of the mountains will find much entertainment in the book, but also it is worth while in a serious way as an authoritative addition to the social history of our frontier life.

In "The Romance of the Boundaries" John T. Faris has undertaken a work of real historic significance. It contains a score or more of accounts of incidents concerning the boundaries, international or State, of this country notable for their humor or their drama or their human interest. A few of them are fairly well known to readers with a bent for history, but many are the fruits of much searching among books and records of more detail than can be found in popular volumes. The author begins with the "Aroostook War" of the 1830s and 1840s, which proved to be bloodless and ended in compromise and treaty over the line between Maine and Canada, and ends with the difficulties of Iowa over her boundaries. These, says the author, are of special interest, because the struggle over the limits of this State illustrates the incessant wrangles and disturbances going on in this country during the generation preceding the Civil War over the "balance of power" between the free and the slave-holding sections. It was this struggle that caused many of the boundary disputes whose stories Mr. Faris tells. But there are also many others, some of them amusing enough to our own day so long afterward, but so serious at the time that they held menacing possibilities for the young Republic.

Mr. Faris tells the tale of the Republic of the Green Mountains and its boundaries, which after fourteen years of independence became the State of Vermont. New Hampshire had trouble over her northern delimiting line, resulting in the formation of the Indian Stream Territory, over which were much wrangling, diplomacy and threats. The long stories of dicker and diplomacy over the boundaries of Minnesota, Alaska and the region about Niagara show how easy it would have been for this country and Great Britain to have dropped into war many a time. The trouble over the Texas border, Connecticut's thousand and one quarrels over her rights to wide acres, the wrangles that bounded Pennsylvania, the claims of Wisconsin and her militant threats to Congress are among the interesting tales Mr. Faris has dug up and presented in interesting style.

It is a scholarly book, depending much on contemporary accounts and historical records for incident and color. Scholarly and painstaking also is the author's careful method of explaining the origins of these quarrels and going back to the causes of illfeeling. When the reader has finished one of these boundary tales he knows all about how and when and why the difficulty started, how it grew, what happened concerning it and how it was settled. The work is copiously illustrated from photographs that are beautifully reproduced, and its value is much enhanced by a dozen maps.

"Wild Bill" Hickok, "Prince of Pistoleers"

WILD BILL HICKOK. By Frank J. Wilstach. Illustrated with eight photographs. 304 pp. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.50.

ONE by one the noted man-killers of the last frontier are being hauled out of the mists of forgetfulness and illusion and examined by critical biographers. The latest figure out of the bloody and romantic past to be thus examined is James Butler ("Wild Bill") Hickok, described by Mr. Wilstach as "The Prince of Pistoleers."

This task Mr. Wilstach has performed with diligence, and the result is convincing. There has been a wide divergence of opinion concerning Hickok. Some have held that he was nothing more than a murderous gun fighter who chanced to be on the side of the law and that he killed with needless, wanton recklessness; others, equally sincere, have regarded him as a model citizen and a fearless and capable peace officer who shot only when there was a reason for shooting.

Mr. Wilstach, though he dispels many a gaudy myth, inclines to the latter view.

For example, Mr. Wilstach makes out a convincing case to prove that Wild Bill was never in Dodge City, where the late Bat Masterson performed as peace officer. For years the public has been fed with yarns of Wild Bill's doings in Dodge City. Again, Mr. Wilstach shows that in the famous McCandles "massacre" Wild Bill did not perform any such epic feat as killing ten men, as even ordinarily reliable writers have assumed; indeed, only three men lost their lives in the McCandles fight.

Then there is the story that Wild Bill and Calamity Jane, that fascinating harridan of the border, were sweethearts. Mr. Wilstach demolishes this fancy. What if Jane did request that her body be buried next to that of Wild Bill, where it rests today? That doesn't prove anything, except perhaps that Jane, even at death, had a flair for publicity. This is not to say that there were no women in Hickok's life. There was the pretty Indian girl who followed him, heartbroken, from town to town, and to whom he wrote many letters; there was also his wife, the former manager of a circus, for whom he seems to have had a real affection.

Buffalo Bill used to be able to count off thirty-five men who, he said, had been killed by Wild Bill Hickok. But Colonel Cody was counting the ten men in the McCandles affair, where there really were only three. Other estimates run as high as seventy-five. Mr. Wilstach says that twelve can be counted easily enough, but that after that one comes upon "perturbing doubts and insistent questionings." It is probable, however, that Bill killed a great many more than any dozen men, and that seventy-five is fairly accurate, if one counts the various Indians laid low by this eminent gun-toter and the Confederate soldiers whom he slew as a sniper during the Civil War.

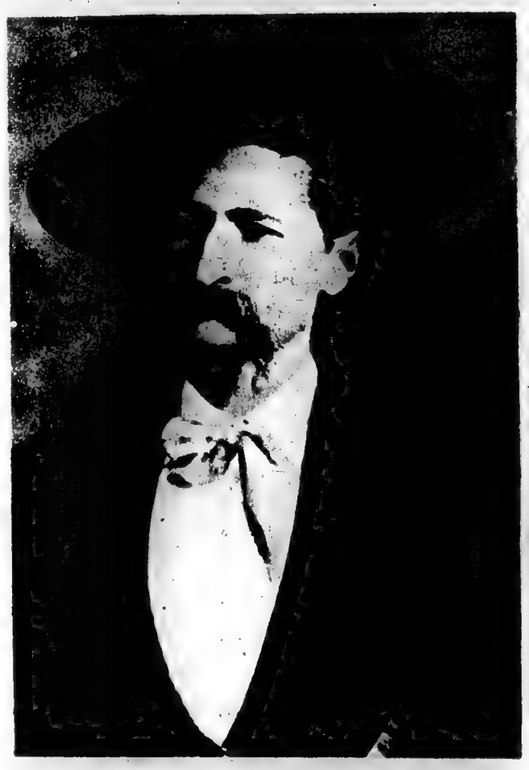
The job of getting a coherent and truthful account of the whole of Hickok's life is manifestly impossible. Mr. Wilstach, the most painstaking investigator to tackle the job, has been unable to fill in wide gaps.

On the apparently indisputable evidence, however, Wild Bill remains the greatest gun fighter who ever got into action. He shot from the hip, with either hand, and he had no triggers on his pistols. Once two men sought to kill him. One entered by the rear of a saloon, the other from the front; Wild Bill, shooting in two directions at once, killed them both. The boy never missed. At fifty yards he could put six shots into a circle no larger than a man's heart; he could cut a chicken's throat at thirty paces without touching its head or body or even breaking its neck; he amused his friends by driving the cork into a bottle without breaking the bottle neck; he was able to hit a dime at fifty paces nine times out of ten. What a man! And still people are saying that the late Annie Oakley could shoot.

Wild Bill was a fancy dresser, his attire usually being somewhat in the style of the Mississippi steamboat gambler. He was handsome, tall, with long brown hair which swept in profusion over his shoulders. Women were attracted to him, and the men who knew him swore by him forever after. He seems to have been fearless, despite certain innuendoes that have crept up at various intervals since the amateur undertaker buried him at Deadwood. He drank and gambled; indeed, he appears to have been inordinately fond of the cards. He was playing cards in a saloon when Jack McCall sent a bullet through his head—from the back.

Moreover, Mr. Hickok—to speak of him in the manner which he preferred rather than the more vulgar Wild Bill—appears to have taken his job as marshal with great seriousness. He was a hound for "law enforcement." When an ordinance was passed forbidding gambling he construed it literally and invaded the homes of citizens to stop whist games. That was laying it on a bit thick, and was not calculated to make a man popular.

All in all, the Hickok whom Mr. Wilstach has so carefully resurrected was an admirable type of men. A little quick with the guns, perhaps, but then, as Wild Bill himself often said, he was not a man to be put upon.



"Wild Bill" Hickok.

Civilization Surveyed

THE CONQUEST OF CIVILISATION. By James Henry Breasted. 717 pp. New York and London: Harper & Bros.

THE ORDEAL OF CIVILIZATION. A Sketch of the Development and World-wide Diffusion of Our Present-Day Institutions and Ideas. By James Harvey Robinson. 709 pp. New York and London: Harper & Bros.

By WILLIAM MacDONALD

IT is possible that these two books are not, in the strictest sense of the term, a unique production, they certainly represent a kind of bookmaking which has had few illustrations, and which in some of its features gives a critic pause. Most students of history will be able to recall a few instances in which some learned or popular treatise has been made over to do duty as a textbook, but the cases are rare in which a textbook has been revamped to catch the attention of the so-called general reader, and put upon the market under the guise of a new work. Yet this is what has happened in the present case. The two egregiously weighty volumes to which the publishers, apparently for advertising purposes only, have given the box title of "The Human Adventure," but which on their respective covers and title-pages appear as "The Conquest of Civilization" and "The Ordeal of Civilization," are in substance reprints, illustrations as well as texts, of two well-known college textbooks by the same authors published some years ago by another house under the titles, "Ancient Times" and "Mediaeval and Modern Times."

As the textbooks, we believe, are still in print and widely used, the bibliographer is offered the rather curious case of twin volumes, originally issued by one publisher, brought out in revised form by another under an amicable business arrangement, both editions, meantime, running contemporaneously; while the unwary "grad," prosperous enough now to give a reminiscent nod to culture by adding some recent books to his library, and more attentive to titles, bindings and colorful jackets than to the warnings of prefaces, may find that his own bit of human adventure has rewarded him with two handsome volumes whose contents largely duplicate certain textbooks which he was constrained to study in that omnium gatherum of the college curriculum known as History 1.

It is only fair to the two eminent authors to say that they have not sought merely to harvest a second crop from a field which has already yielded rich returns. A comparison of the two texts shows almost innumerable changes, far the larger part, to be sure, of a minor or unimportant kind, but some made necessary by new knowledge and the march of time. Chapters have been rearranged and equipped with new titles, sentences have been omitted, abridged, or expanded, and first statements softened or emphasized. As should be expected, the changes of substance are most numerous in the earlier part of Professor Breasted's volume, where the rapid advance of archaeological investigation has added much to our knowledge of the early Eastern civilizations. A typical example of this kind of revision occurs in a passage in which Professor Breasted describes the papyrus rolls of the early Egyptian age. In the "Ancient Times" the passage runs as follows:

> Very few rolls were needed to deal with the science of this time. The largest and most valuable of all contained what they had learned about medicine and the organs of the human body. This oldest medical book, when unrolled, is today about sixty-six feet long and has recipes for all sorts of ailments. Some of them are still good and call for remedies which, like castor oil, are still in common use; others represent the ailment as due to demons, which were long believed to be the cause of disease.

In "The Conquest of Civilization" this passage undergoes the following metamorphosis:

> Probably few rolls were needed to deal with the science of the Feudal Age. The most valuable of these is the Edwin Smith Papyrus, which is a copy made in late Hyksos times, in the seventeenth century B. C., of an older medical book. It is the earliest known really scientific document, for in it we find the human mind for the first time endeavoring in the first place to discern and record the facts, and then to base conclusions upon these observed facts. It is a treatise on surgery and external medicine, which begins at the top of the head and goes downward. It is unfortunately broken off at the thorax and the uppermost spinal vertebra. It contains the earliest known observations on the human brain, and indeed the word "brain" occurs in it for the first time in any known written document. * * * Surgical stitching is mentioned for the first time in medical literature, and the physician has discovered that the heart is the driving power in a system of which it is the centre. This is not, however, necessarily a recognition of the circulation of the blood. The other medical treatises represent the ailment as due to demons, which were long believed to be the cause of disease.

The curious in such matters will wonder at the omission of castor oil, which certain Italian authorities have lately found efficacious in changing the patient's state of mind and political point of view, and will be left to speculate as to whether the archaeologists may not have seriously misread at first the Egyptian rolls in question.

Professor Robinson's original text also undergoes a good many minor alterations, together with others of a different kind. His first chapter, for example, opens with a few paragraphs in which the author of "The New History" tells briefly how and why he long ago became "dissatisfied with what passed for history," and how much more significant the story of Western Europe appeared when looked at in another way. The original sections relating to the World War have also been somewhat, but much too little, overhauled, and chapters have been added on Europe since the war and the "present trend of human affairs," the first half of the latter being devoted to a disquisition on "the importance of being historically minded."

Professor Breasted's volume is described by the publishers as a "brilliant survey of the first social, intellectual and artistic achievements of men" which "must rank with the finest historical writing of our day," and Professor Robinson's as "a graphic and illuminating narrative and a contribution to history of extraordinary value." The first of these ascriptions is truer than the second. No summary sketch of the history of the ancient world at once so learned, so well proportioned and so well written as Professor Breasted's "Ancient Times," had yet been produced in textbook form by an American scholar when that book appeared. In a much-used phrase, he made the ancient past live again, and the popularity of his book as a student manual has been a deserved tribute to its distinguished qualities.

"The Ordeal of Civilization" belongs in a somewhat different class. The foundation of Professor Robinson's fame as a textbook writer was laid in his "Introduction to the History of Western Europe," a book which was little short of a revelation to most teachers and students of the time, of the possibilities of ordered and related treatment in the fifteen hundred years of European history with which it dealt. The particular distinction of the book was its able and stimulating presentation of the history of the Roman Church, the later Roman Empire of the West, and the Protestant revolt, at all of which points Professor Robinson erected a standard which has ever since, to a very large extent at least, been followed.

None of the many textbooks, however, which branched later from this vigorous trunk, rivaled, or indeed equaled, the standard of historical interest or literary flavor set by the famous "Introduction." Commendable as they were in their adaptation to the needs of different classes of students, they nevertheless gave the impression, as far as Professor Robinson's part in them could be discerned, of being to a large extent rearrangements or expansions of an original which in its way was fairly to be called a work of art. "The Ordeal of Civilization," accordingly, like the "Mediaeval and Modern Times" which preceded it, is another conglomerate of the old manner and the new. So much of it as is reminiscent of the "Introduction" still holds the charm of style and the flavor of mastery that made the "Introduction" a great performance. The rest, with regret be it said, is undistinguished.

Pure Poetry in France

PARIS.

YOU may remember my telling you of the strange theories of M. l'Abbé Bremond on pure poetry, on the occasion of his memoir on this subject, read before the plenary session of the Five Academies on Oct. 26, 1925. I should probably not have mentioned them again if he had not just published two new volumes, "La poésie pure" ("Pure Poetry") and "Prière et poésie" ("Prayer and Poetry").

These two volumes—and especially the first, which is full of them—contain a number of highly abusive diatribes against me. For I had taken the liberty of disagreeing with the Abbé Bremond. In his eyes the slightest objection, though couched in the most courteous terms, appears as most damnable heresy and as a personal insult.

However, this might not be sufficient reason for my returning to this question here if the Abbé Bremond did not claim in his book on "Pure Poetry" to be refuting the article I devoted to him in these columns a year ago, and if he did not accuse me of having been inaccurate in my presentation of his ideas to the American public. He even dares to declare that I did not take the pains to read him. I agree that it is painful, that the reading of this book is most tiresome. I would much rather read works reputed to be exceedingly difficult, such as the most abstract treatises of Plato or Aristotle, Descartes or Spinoza, Kant or Hegel. There the difficulty lies in the subject itself; but these great spirits move in a masterly fashion amid their material, knowing where they are going. And the reader's effort to follow them is rewarded. The theories of the Abbé Bremond, on the other hand, are not extraordinary or difficult in themselves. But his exposition is vague, involved and contradictory—one gains the impression that he is trying to confuse and disconcert his readers rather than to teach them. He is very hostile toward intellectualism, logic and reason. His motives for this are personal. An author who writes in this manner can profess nothing but an obscure mysticism.

FINALLY, I am not in the habit of leading astray my readers of either hemisphere with false analyses. I follow conscientiously the precept of Sainte-Beuve, who said that "for one who would speak of a book, nothing is so helpful as the reading of it." Let the Abbé Bremond say what he will—I read him through, and when I reviewed his academic memoir to you I quoted from the text. I told you that he excluded ideas, sentiments and images as being impure elements, and let poetry consist of a mysterious fluid that, passing through words with little or no meaning, brings us into direct communication with God. He protests that this is what he wrote:

> Today we no longer say that a poem contains vivid pictures, sublime sentiments or thoughts; this, and that, and the ineffable besides. But we say: "Primarily and above all there is the ineffable—closely bound, however, to this or that."

Very well. But he forgets to add that for him this ineffable factor constitutes the whole of poetry, and that to his mind the rest—this and that, thoughts and sentiments—are only impurities. The copper used in an alloy does not become fine gold by this simple process. Therefore, he endeavored, in his memoir, to find cases where the base copper—thought and sentiment—are eliminated entirely, leaving the poetry in its pure state. He taught that "it is not always necessary to grasp the meaning" of a line or of a poem in order to perceive its strictly poetic beauty. He explained that this "expression, either devoid of meaning, or with a meaning of little worth," succeeds in "vibrating," thanks to a "mysterious fluid" or to a "current" that "electrifies" it. And the very title of his second volume, "Prayer and Poetry," is evidence that, according to him, this "current" and "fluid" come straight from Heaven, differing only in degree, and not in kind, from mystic ecstasy and trance.

I had to clear myself of this charge; I shall dwell on it no longer. Besides, all the important poets of our times—from M. Paul Valéry, the most intellectual of them all, to Mme. de Noailles, the most spontaneous and the most natural—are unanimous in disagreeing with him.

There has been produced and published a play in verse by M. Maurice Rostand, entitled "La déserteuse" ("The Deserter"), in which he, too, expresses his views on poetry. But, while he does not make much ado about thought, properly speaking, he bases his entire view of poetry on sentiment, thus also being quite at variance with the Abbé Bremond. To this he adds an odd "dolorism," a revival of that of Musset and Baudelaire. It was I—I say it without conceit—who created this word, as also another, "bellicism," which has since become part of our daily speech. The hero of M. Maurice Rostand's play is a dramatic poet who is not a genius and who cannot create without suffering. He can no longer write anything worth while, he has "gone stale," as they say, because he is too happy. Then the woman he loves and who adores him betrays him so that his grief will bring back his inspiration; and a few months later he has actually produced a new masterpiece. A reconciliation follows. His love convinces him that what she did was for his own good. But will she have to betray him again every time a publisher or a producer orders a play from him?

Announcement has been made of the first volume of Ernest Renan's "Correspondence," of "If the Grain Does Not Die," by M. André Gide, and of "The Magistrate," by M. Bouchardon.

PAUL SOUDAY.

The Greek Poets

And from the udders of the bleating ewes
Since thou art dead, no more the fair milk flows;

Nay, nor from hives the honey of the bees
Stored when thy song made sunny all the hours,
In comb it perishes with thy strains.
With these
All sweetness passed from earth.
By bees the flowers
Remain unvarished; and it less behooves
Than honey in hives, to seek for song in groves.

In the closing stanzas—the reviewer is making a wide jump—the death of Bion is described; but death cannot be the end of the singer, who, like Orpheus, has by singing been made immortal. Moschus regrets that he could not follow Bion even to the house of Hades, where perhaps he would have found Persephoné, "Sicilying, as she remembered Sicily,"

For she in thy dear island home was born,
And with her mates in Enna's vale would play,
Bright blossoms plucking tresses to adorn
As when by Dis to Hades borne away;
And well she knew and loved the Dorian speech
Of nymphs of Acis' well and Cyclops' beach.

And she will grant thee guerdon for thy song
As once she bowed to Orpheus' melting plea,
Letting him take his bride with him along
To light of day—the dear Eurydice.
So shall thy moving prayer as his be strong,
And give thee back to hills of Sicily.

How closely, part by part, Milton followed in "Lycidas" this lament is apparent. Milton, the Puritan, could not maintain his assumed paganism without, as it were, an apology. Lycidas must hear, the inexpressive nuptial song

In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love, for Edward King was not a Greek poet, but an English youth at an English university. Except, however, this, and other minor, mostly Puritanic, differences, "Lycidas" is a Greek elegy, an interweaving of Theocritus and Moschus.

The reviewer is resolved to make his own last paragraph an apology—to Dr. Miller. When writing on Dr. Miller's translations of Sappho he said (rather churlishly, he recalls) that translated ancient poetry could not be "naturalized" (Dr. Miller's word) into English verse. In "The Greek Idyls" the translator has achieved a masterly synthesis of true rendition and poetic individuality. Dr. Miller's translation of the "Lament" alone would stand as an addition to English letters. When one remembers all else there is besides in the volume, one can scarcely bestow too much praise on the work.

AN ELEGANT HISTORY OF NEW YORK SOCIETY FOR YOUNG PERSONS OF QUALITY. With a Glossary and Certain Examples and Armorial Bearings. By Samuel M. Ordway Jr. Illustrated by F. Wenderoth Saunders. New York: The Elegant History Publishing Company.

By H. I. BROCK

IT is a very refreshing volume that Sarah M. Lockwood—who has already refreshed another dusty subject in "Antiques"—has composed or concocted about New York. She shows as jaunty and fearless a spirit in the face of history as in the presence of furniture—and, one may guess, cherishes a keen but not insane enthusiasm about both. New York, in particular, she likes so well that she feels free to speak freely about New Yorkers of any age or period.

For example, though she honestly admires and respects that doughty Dutch Governor, Peter Stuyvesant, she knows him, none the less, for a "self-righteous, pig-headed bigot." Again, the cause of the Indian massacre which occurred while Stuyvesant was away forcibly annexing Peter Minuit's colony of Swedes down on the Delaware in 1655 is succinctly stated thus: "A stupid fool by the name of van Dyck shot a squaw whom he caught stealing peaches from his orchard." The author's idea is to treat New York as very much alive—and all New Yorkers as still alive, even though they may have been dead 100 years. Thus a book which is both a history and a guide-book obtains a quality of warmth which is usually absent in such lucubrations.

At times Mrs. Lockwood appears as an ardent champion of a figure who steps upon the stage she has selected—the Island of Manhattan. George Washington has his glory magnified, if possible; not subtracted from. But if she does not like a character, she says so. There was Lord Cornbury, a Governor sent over to us by Queen Anne. He was a kinsman of the Queen's Own Majesty. None the less, "This Cornbury person was impossible." To us he might mean nothing if he did not happen to be the person who contrived to get his royal cousin to grant to Trinity Church the "Queen's Farm" which still keeps Trinity Corporation in the real-estate business. Rich local aristocrats were interested, we are told, and "Cornbury was frankly open to bribes." It is an old scandal, but Mrs. Lockwood's treatment of it freshens it up surprisingly.

Again, there are the pirates. Pirates used always to be exciting. Lately the way they have been writing about him has robbed even Captain Kidd of his thrills. He has ceased to shiver our timbers. But here the pirates are properly approached. So that, even if Big Business in New York was in cahoots with them, these high seas operators are not robbed of romance. Off Madagascar they lie in wait for Indiamen and bring the spoil of the East to New York as a hospitable market. Or New York will send a ship to Madagascar—a ship laden with two-shilling-a-gallon rum—thriftily sell the rum to the pirates at 50 shillings the gallon and sail back to the home port laden with the pirates' loot.

Once, during one of the last years of the seventeenth century, nine pirate ships were anchored in the bay between the Battery and Staten Island, and the roysterings of the pirate crews, while a bit noisy, were mighty profitable to the drink-sellers along Pearl Street. Pearl Street was then the waterfront. Captain Tew, just prosperously in from Madagascar, came ashore in his "picturesque and alarming costume." Tew was a "slight dark man of 40, garbed in a blue cap with a band of cloth of silver, loose trunks of white linen and curiously worked stockings; while a chain of Arabian gold hung from his neck, and through the meshes of a knit belt gleamed a dagger, its hilt set with the rarest stones." Mr. Winthrop Ames could not do better than that with his Gilbertian Pirate King that it is so glorious a thing to be. In 1694 such a pirate could be seen walking right up Broadway. For, to our best people, pirates were the "darlings of their hearts to be coddled and entertained." No wonder Captain Kidd, sent out by Lord Bellomont to catch pirates, turned pirate himself. When he was hanged on Execution Dock he was a victim not so much of his crimes as of a change of fashion.

Still again, it is pleasant to have the description of that "stout and indefatigable" post rider to Boston who was sent out by Governor Lovelace in 1673 to break the trail which was to become the Boston Post Road, with its ceaseless procession of motor cars in our day, and to be the prototype of all the traffic between the two capitals which is now handled by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. Also, how agreeable it is to be introduced to Governor Edmund Andros (who at one time united New England, New York and New Jersey under his authority) as a "dashing Major of dragoons." And then take note of the concrete effect of that "bolting act" for which Sir Edmund was responsible—not at all the sort of personal thing it might seem, but a law giving New York City the monopoly of handling all the grain in the colony. It was to that monopoly that the town owed its growth, in the sixteen years after 1678, from a settlement of 300 houses to a community of 1,000 houses, with business for eighty trading ships where eleven had served before. In grateful memory, the coat-of-arms of our city, to this day, displays a windmill and flour barrels.

These are mere samples of the sort of thing that Mrs. Lockwood's method brings into sharp relief. Perhaps, if you treat history in so free and easy a style you fall inevitably into inaccuracies. But even if it does not seem quite fair to describe Queen Anne as a niece of William and Mary, it is more than likely that Mrs. Lockwood did not really mean to do it.

The gukle-hook part is not, perhaps, quite as different as the history part of the volume. Yet it is remarkably successful in providing places with the curious or significant backgrounds which make places worth while at all. The stranger in New York will be enormously assisted. The amateur of New York will have his knowledge enriched by reading what is here set down. Take, for example, Kirke Brown's bronze George Washington on horseback standing at the southeast corner of Union Square and looking across at the bronze Lafayette on foot a few yards away. Which one of us knows that this was the first equestrian statue set up in this town after the lead one of George III, which was pulled down in 1776 and melted into bullets to shoot at King George's soldiers? It was unveiled July 4, 1856, and the historic reason for its standing where it has no artistic excuse for being is that the citizens of the town met Washington at about that spot when he rode in after the British evacuation in 1783. So far, not all the artists have been able to move the bronze horseman to a spot where he can be seen to better advantage.

Henry Collins Brown's "New York in the Elegant Eighties" is another of the series of Valentine's Manuals into which this indefatigable antiquarian of everything that relates to the city has for years been pouring his accumulations of material. The present volume has more connection and less extension of subject than is the case with many previous volumes, and the survey of the next to the last decade of the nineteenth century—the decade before the one which has been called Mauve—includes a mass of illuminating material. This was the period when Ward McAllister created the "Four Hundred," which has been legendary ever since, and the story of how he created it—an oft-told story, to be sure—is only one of many stories and descriptive passages which undertake to recreate the life of the city when fine ladies wore especially and particularly—bustles. The very jacket of the book shows three fashion-plate figures in magnificent bustles and another colored plate shows the Broadway stage before it reached the double-decker form in which some of us elders affectionately recall the horse-drawn predecessor of the Fifth Avenue bus of today.

Mr. Brown reminds us that at this period there was still a gap in the built-up city between New York proper and Harlem, a gap which the elevated bridged at the price of a number of very little-used stations in between, and that commuting had hardly been invented, though there were foreshadowings of what was to come in New Jersey and Long Island. The Bronx, which was called "The Annexed District," was protected by a force of seven mounted policemen—and possibly better protected than it is now.

However, burglary flourished considerably, there were plenty of bunco-steerers for the innocent and unwary, and the waterfront was infested with desperate characters. Mr. Brown notes, among other curious matters, that the arrival of the cash register gave the bartender a black eye long before prohibition came to finish him off. After the cash register came, he says, the man behind the bar presently ceased to be the sort of man who later owned a saloon of his own. Enterprising persons approached that ambition by other roads not so well guarded by toll-gate bells.

By the way, this volume is especially rich in reproductions of drawings from woodcuts and other illustrative material, furnishing a very complete pictorial record of the decade. It was, in fact, a decade in which the periodical press used woodcuts for news pictures almost as we now use photographs.

The third volume in the list at the top of this page assumes to treat New York satirically. It contains a number of very amusing pictures, apparently linoleum cuts and some very laborious letter-press which appears to have been written under the impression that it too was amusing. Mr. Ordway, the author, is happier in his artist than the artist, Mr. Saunders, is in his author.

Recollections of a Circus Clown

HERE WE ARE AGAIN! Recollections of An Old Circus Clown. By Robert Edmund Sherwood. Illustrated with photographs. 293 pp. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

THE dedication of this book is "To All the Young and Old Boys Who Carried Water for the Elephant," which means that almost all American "boys," particularly those whose boyhoods are merely reminiscently close, will be interested. It is a circus book for adults, though it would be a pity if younger readers were not given a chance at the book too, for it relates the fact that George Washington attended the first circus in the United States in 1780; thus somewhat alleviating the cherry tree smugness which children still feel. It is a book abounding in incidents, episodes and anecdotes of historical and personal interest. It is told easily, chattily, and with a true note of sincerity.

Many changes have taken place in circus ways—"acts" which are out of date now, simplicity of presentation which has given way before the modern need for more extensive advertising, publicity and elaboration. Today clowns carry carloads of properties for their acts. In the days of "Bob" Sherwood "a peacock feather, an inflated bladder tied by a string to a long whipstock, or a tin whistle, was deemed sufficient equipment for any competent clown."

P. T. Barnum has been acknowledged as the greatest showman who ever lived—perhaps the most personified example of the accuracy of applied terms of exaggeration. For he deserved his superlatives as the circus deserves its superlatives, but according to Mr. Sherwood, one of the most generally circulated remarks attributed to Barnum is quite untrue.

"There's a sucker born every minute," is a slang phrase, always attributed to Mr. Barnum. The great impresario never expressed himself in this manner. Primarily, the word "sucker" as a slang slogan was not in use during Barnum's lifetime. His favorite expression was "the American people like to be humbugged."

There are many interesting "notables" encountered in this book, delightful tales of Mark Twain, who first visited the circus after having been criticized for smoking before students, after a lecture delivered in a theological institution. He said "that he thought it was about time for him to look up some people of his own stripe," and from then on the author and Mr. Sherwood were friends. The chapter dealing with this friendship is one of the most delightful in the book.

Then there was the time the circus played before Queen Victoria. And here was a Sherwood innovation.

Everything proceeded according to instructions until my turn came. I had read that court jesters of old were accorded a license not given to others of the royal attendants. I was suddenly struck with an idea. Glancing over to where Mr. Barnum was standing at the music stand, I saw that my every movement was being watched, but I remembered the old adage, "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." Walking over to within ten feet of the box, I grotesquely pantomimed the cleaning of my hands by vigorously rubbing them on my costume. Putting on my most engaging grin, I walked right up to the box and suddenly proffered my hand to the Queen.

It was a tense moment. Out of the corner of my eye I could see Mr. Barnum jumping around like a chicken on a hot griddle; for about two seconds my heart was in my mouth. The Queen, however, fell into the humor of the situation, and most graciously extended her hand, which I took lightly in mine, the incident bringing thunderous applause from a packed house. Turning quickly, I ran to the ring bank, airily kissed my finger-tips first to the royal party, then to the audience, and jumped into the ring for my act. Mr. Barnum was so upset that he would not allow me to go on again that afternoon. He was pleased at the outcome, but said, "If you go on again, how do I know you won't invite her out to dinner?"

"Here We Are Again!" is a thoroughly enjoyable book, vivified by the personality of the friendly, chatty, cheery author, and it produces the feeling in the reader that those whose business it is to make people laugh have an inherent supply of laughter of spirit. So much so that it seems cruelly ironic that so many clowns have died not only in poverty but in public institutions.

"Transfiguration" and Other Recent Works of Fiction

TRANSFIGURATION.* By Sergeev Tsensky. *Translated from the Russian by Marie Budberg. Edited with an introduction by Maxim Gorky. 300 pp. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co. $2.50.

IN his preface to "Transfiguration" Maxim Gorky tells us that "it is the greatest book that has been written in Russia in the last twenty-four years" and that its author, S. N. Sergeev Tsensky, has won by writing it a legitimate place among the greatest Russian masters of prose. It is doubtful whether even such a powerful argument as the weight of Gorky's name will make this piece of gross exaggeration sound convincing to those who take the trouble of reading the book. It is rather the contrary that should be expected; those who did not know that Gorky has the bad habit of overpraising second-rate writers may close the book with a feeling of bitter disappointment. It will be, however, a pity if such a thing happens, for, if not judged by the standards of "Anna Karenina" or of "Crime and Punishment," "Transfiguration" may be read and enjoyed. It is neither a masterpiece nor a document which might become an immortality-license for its author, but merely a good and interesting novel. In other words, it is what it might be expected to be: Sergeev Tsensky is not a young writer, and he has in Russia a serious and a well-established reputation; yet he has always been considered as one of the "minor" contemporaries of Gorky, Andreyev and the like.

The present volume is a complete novel, an entirely self-supporting literary entity; yet, unless the present reviewer is very much mistaken, it is meant to be the first part of a much wider work.

Sergeev Tsensky spent the years of war and revolution in the Crimea pasturing cows and devoting his time to agricultural pursuits. It is there that he conceived the idea of a large epopee covering the last two decades of eventful Russian life. And when the Russian original of the present volume appeared in 1923 at Simferopol it was generally understood to be the beginning of this monumental work. It is a pity that this fact has not been mentioned by Sergeev Tsensky's American publishers, for the present volume, as it stands, does not bear out its title. We find no transfiguration in the "Transfiguration," for, apparently, the transfiguration is yet to come.

The whole novel is laid against the colorful background of the Crimea, which the author draws with a great gusto and an undeniable taste. His rich, perhaps at times too rich, "ornamental" style lends itself very well to the visualization of landscapes (a fact which will probably remain unappreciated by those who read his book in translation). The heroes of the novel are middle-class intellectuals of pre-war days whose neurasthenic garrulity and spinelessness are strangely romanticized by the author. They spend most of their time in philosophizing on the "meaning of life," in hesitating between the acceptance of life and its condemnation, between the "everlasting yea" and the "everlasting no." Some of them—like, for instance, the crippled college student enlarging in his diary on the "Pathology of God," the creator of ugliness, deformity and disease — are undoubtedly well drawn, however stylicized; but some others are artificial, and the depths of pseudo-psychology revealed in them by the author fail to convince the reader.

The little of action there is in the novel is spun around Alexey Ivanovich, the architect, whose wife died in misery after being seduced and then abandoned by a self-satisfied provincial player. Alexey Ivanovich's Hamlet-like hesitation between the desire of avenging her downfall and the feeling of the futility of all vengeance, the hallucination haunting his mind and the faint yet audible call of life prompting him to forget his tragedy, are on the whole well drawn and convincing. The novel ends with the scene during which he fires three shots at his offender, only to understand that he has done the wrong thing.

What kind of transfiguration will regenerate Alexey Ivanovich, the hysterical girl for whom he began to feel something like a nascent love on the very eve of his crime, the crippled student and all the others, is not clear. The achievement of the present novel lies in the fact that the reader closes it with the desire of learning the subsequent fate of its protagonists and with interest in the novel that will probably follow.

PLEASANT MR. LOCKE

PERELLA.* By William J. Locke. *378 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

IN "Perella" Mr. Locke has written one of those urbane, agreeable and absolutely innocent tales which have endeared him to that large public which likes its fiction put up under the pure food and drug law. Perella Annaway was the daughter of John Annaway, a drunken and lovable English publicist, who turned her out to shift for herself when he decided to live with an unmarried successor to his wife. Perella went to Florence, where she eked out a miserable income by copying pictures in the galleries, and made the acquaintance, at the Pension Toselli, of Anthony Blake, a giddy, attractive young English artist.

The inevitable love affair developed. Anthony and Perella were engaged, and they were both taken up by Professor Sylvester Gayton, the great authority on painting. Anthony went further, and was patronized by Beatrice Ellison, a wealthy, headstrong American widow. She persuaded Anthony to plan to go to America, to spend the Summer with her at Dinard, to visit her country place in Hungary, &c. Soon pathetic little Perella was forgotten in the hope of a financial success in those United States.

Perella went to Venice, where she had commissions to copy masterpieces for South American cognoscenti, and there, while under Professor Gayton's protection, fell and broke her arm so badly that she could never paint again. So of course the Professor hired an ambulance and took her back to his villa at Florence, where—aided by Anthony's vague attempts to shake free of her—Perella broke her engagement and married the elderly expert on things artistic. And Anthony made matters even by marrying Beatrice Ellison.

Anthony then began to be a great commercial success; his work was demanded in the best American magazines and he was on the highroad to fame, when he and his secret wife (the marriage was kept subrosa to avoid gossip) returned to Florence. He and Perella met each other again, and slowly, inevitably fell in love with each other once more. Having been detected by their respective spouses exchanging a last, tragic kiss in a Summer house, the two marriages of convenience and affection seem destined to fall to ruins before the imperious demands of youthful love for youth. So Beatrice and Sylvester run off together and fabricated material for a divorce action. Anthony and Perella dallied with the idea of eventual happiness, but when the latter discovered that Sylvester was doing all this to make her truly happy, she decided that true happiness can never be found through the divorce court. She returned to her aged husband and thus vindicated the niceties—Mr. Locke never comes within a mile of injuring the proprieties—of harmless romance. Anthony, one gathers, was not quite the stuff to return to a wife he no longer loved and who knew that she was old and unloved. But then, one can't have everything, even in a novel by William J. Locke.

The book is written in a pleasant, undramatic style, well matched to the triviality of its structure and dramatic episode. The author relies a little too much on accident for his motivation. Thus, Perella's broken arm leads to her marriage and a sprained ankle leads to her resumption of tenderness for Anthony. Fiction has progressed since Dido needed the intervention of a thunderstorm to persuade the divine Aeneas to spend the night in a cave with her. Character is now considered a fitter basis for motive than the intervention of Providence. Mr. Locke, though sound in his dénouement, is inclined to string his narrative together like a chain of beads, not weave character and action together into a satisfactory fabric. But the author of nearly thirty widely read novels can be trusted to know his public, and there is no doubt that Mr. Locke's work is, above all other so-called popular fiction, very clean, wholesome and, in the main, exceedingly competent—qualities which reflect on neither a writer nor his readers.

MORE OF RASPUTIN

BLINDED KINGS.* By J. Kessel and H. Iswolsky. *Translated from the French by G. and K. de Teissier. 308 pp. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. 1926. $2.50.

"BLINDED KINGS" is a historical novel. Its principal figure is Gregory Rasputin, its background the life of the Russian aristocracy and court in the last years of the Empire of the Czars, and its stage setting luxurious palaces and reception rooms of Petrograd. The authors of the novel, J. Kessel and Miss H. Iswolsky, the daughter of Imperial Russia's Minister of Foreign Affairs, tell us in the foreword that their purpose has been to reproduce "the period and its chief actors" with all possible accuracy of facts and details.

In "Blinded Kings" (they assert) there is not a statement, an anecdote nor a suggestion which is not upheld by evidence; whose origin is not in some document or in a conversation which we were fortunate to have with one of the protagonists or witnesses of the great drama.

"Not a suggestion which is not upheld by evidence" is certainly a dreadful overstatement; to pretend that "Blinded Kings" is an ideal of historical accuracy would be senseless, but that it is, on the whole, a correct record of events is perfectly true. The reader cannot fail to perceive that the authors have taken pains to study the documents bearing on the epoch. Wading through the book, one identifies in it entire passages extracted from or suggested by the reminiscences of Mrs. Vyrubova (the Empress' favorite lady-in-waiting), of the late Bieletzky (Chief of the Secret Police), of Purishkevich (one of Rasputin's murderers), &c.

If, however, some of the chapters of the book read like a popular textbook of history, others are stuffed with altogether different material. Like all authors of Rasputinian novels, Mr. Kessel and Miss Iswolsky treat the reader to a more than sufficient quantity of five-and-ten-cent-store "thrills," "stunts," "mysteries" and firecrackers. Rasputin is shown in a mystical "cloud" of evil fluids from which he drew his supernatural power over men and women (the authors go so far as to actually describe this "cloud"); wonder-working potions and incantations, German spies, "terrible" secrets (which do not terrify), displays of "Asiatic" mysticism ("l'âme Russe," don't you know?), and the word fate written with a capital F and repeated almost on every second page. Such is the atmosphere of chapters which do not deal with some generally known historical events or persons. Nothing could be objected against these thrills if they were effective. Unfortunately, however, the narrative of our authors is preeminently anemic, colorless (in spite of their attempts at lending it as much color as possible) and monotonous.

The technical axis around which the novel is constructed is the love of the noble-minded Count Dolin for the "charming" Lisa Donskaya. Both of them, in contradistinction to most of the other heroes of the book, are imaginary characters. Lisa falls under the hypnotic spell of Rasputin and becomes a devoted friend of the Czarina. To free both her and the imperial family of Rasputin's evil influence, Count Dolin joins Prince Yousupoff, who has decided to kill the hideous monk. Count Dolin and Lisa are unconvincing, unreal and artificial figures. And they both seem to feel exceedingly uneasy in a novel where they are nothing but tie-beams, without which no fiction work can be built. The reader is all the time perfectly aware of the fact that they postpone their concluding kiss with the sole object of giving the authors the space needed for the description of Rasputin's life and death. For such things writers are punished with the highest imaginable punishment—with the reader's yawn.

One closes the novel with the impression that, working on it, its authors hesitated between two temptations—to enrich the world with a new historical monograph and to seduce the reader by a fascinating "Roman de boulevard." It is difficult, however, to kill two such birds with one stone. "Blinded Kings" is a convincing proof thereof.

FROM THE GERMAN

THE INVISIBLE COLLECTION.* By Stefan Zweig. *Illustrated by Joseph Maly. 36 pp. New York: The Pynson Printers. $3.

STEFAN ZWEIG by this time needs no introduction. His "Jeremiah" and his "Passion and Pain" will make many readers eager to get hold of "The Invisible Collection," the half sketch, half short story now printed in an edition limited to only fifty copies. "The Invisible Collection," however, does not belong with Zweig's important work; it is really unimportant, though not trivial or valueless, for it is touched with charm and tenderness and tells a story which, slight as it is, proves interesting and different.

The story of "The Invisible Collection" is told, apparently to Zweig, by a train companion who is an art dealer. For many years his grandfather, father and he himself had sold prints to a man in a small German town who, with admirable foresight, had collected things that greatly increased their value. But after the outbreak of the war the man had written for nothing else. And now, several years after the war, when the dealer had so few good things in stock, he thought that perhaps he could buy back from his old bieta (not every unruly combination of consonants and vowels may pass for a Russian name). But never mind the names. It is much worse when it comes to "castles" with their "tall towers" built by Russian aristocrats along the Dnieper. However vicious of them it may have been, Russian aristocrats never built castles; they built homes, manors, palaces, but castles, towers—no! There are also a great many other things that Russians did not do. Even in the September days of 1917, Russian soldiers did not tear live horses to pieces in order to eat their raw flesh; even in the hottest revolutionary months that preceded the overthrow of Kerensky no obscene dances were performed in churches; even at the moments of greatest revolutionary frenzy Russian mobs did not behave with the nonsensical idiocy which the author ascribes to them. No, all this local color is certainly not Russian, nor can it be the local color of any other nation; one recognizes in it unmistakably the hyperbolic exaggerations, the shifting kaleidoscopic effects, the numberless naïve inaccuracies and blunders of an "exotic" moving-picture melodrama, of a literary bouffonade or farsical operetta.

Indeed, it is with such unpretentious standards that the novel should be approached. Let the reader forget that this is Russia and the Russian revolution, and he will enjoy the nonchalance with which the resourceful and humorous author accumulates adventures, thrills and stunts.

AMOURS OF ROYALTY

THE PRINCE'S LOVE AFFAIR.* By A. H. Bennett. *287 pp. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.

THE amours of royalty always furnish interesting copy, even of such a fickle lover as that Prince of Wales who afterward became George IV of England. In "The Prince's Love Affair" A. H. Bennett tells of his wooing and his morganatic marriage to Mrs. Fitzherbert; that twice widowed lady who won a wedding ring from her royal suitor; though, for State reasons, he later married Caroline Amelia Elizabeth of Brunswick.

It was Mrs. Fitzherbert's misfortune that she happened to have been born a Catholic. For George would doubtless have made her his legal wife but for the Act of 1689, which declared "that all and every person or persons who shall marry a Papist shall be excluded and be forever incapable to inherit, possess or enjoy the Crown and Government of this Realm." According to the author, Maria Fitzherbert was a woman of charm and high moral principles whose influence over her third husband, the Prince of Wales, was tremendous—while it lasted.

The tale of "The Prince's Love Affair" is narrated by one Anthony Hamilton, a young gentleman of fashion who bore a remarkable likeness to the Prince of Wales, which fortuitous resemblance brought him into all sorts of exciting adventure.

MORE OF FLEMING STONE

THE RED-HAIRED GIRL.* By Carolyn Wells. *318 pp. Philadelphia: The J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

THERE can be little doubt that the reason so many criminals go unpunished is that we have no detectives in real life comparable with those who do their stuff in fiction. Your real detective has no imagination. When he finds a man dead from a bullet wound with a pistol by his side he immediately pounces upon the pistol and examines it for fingerprints. That is all wrong, for it can very easily cast suspicion upon an innocent person, as it does in Carolyn Wells's latest novel, "The Red-Haired Girl." In this case the fingerprints are those of the murdered man's brother, Lloyd Converse, who, as the author makes plain from the very beginning, is not the sort of chap to go about shooting people from the back.

The police, being what they are, accept the fingerprints as damning evidence and promptly put Lloyd in jail. Little attention is paid to the story of the patrolman on the beat who tells of seeing a girl with flaming red hair coming out of the house, and still less attention is paid to the cook, who complains that two flatirons have disappeared from her laundry. But when Fleming Stone appears on the scene he immediately perceives that the flatirons constitute the only clue worth bothering with. From them he reconstructs the whole story and finds the real murderer.

Unfortunately, Fleming Stone does not make his appearance until very late in the story. If he had there would have been but two chapters—one describing the finding of the body and one in which the great detective solves the mystery. That would have saved a lot of reading, some of it rather wearisome, for while Miss Wells has concocted a mystery which is difficult enough of solution to hold the interest of the reader, she has not succeeded so well in making her characters live. She makes the mistake of telling us what they are thinking about instead of letting us infer it from what they say and do. Worst of all, she makes the detective's task appear too easy. Not that the solution is particularly obvious, but it seems to require so little effort on the part of Fleming Stone. We like to see a detective earn his fee and his renown by the sweat of his brain, but Fleming Stone gives the impression that solving a mystery is just pie for him. Carolyn Wells has written better mystery stories than this.

GOLD RUSH

THE TENDERFOOTS.* By Francis Lynde. *334 pp. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

FRANCIS LYNDE'S latest novel, "The Tenderfoots," is a popular account of the metamorphosis of a puritanical young man into an understanding and tolerant human being. The story has for its background the gold rush of the late '70s, and is well abreast of the average run of modern adventure stories, both in theme and in craftsmanship.

The chief character in the novel, Philip Trask, is a New Englander, born and bred, and is depicted by the author as a typical provincial. Philip is strictly moral himself in every respect, and possesses that peculiar, short-sighted code concerning personal deportment which demands of others the same hidebound goodness that he himself professes. The one blot in Philip's life is the disappearance of his father from his home, following a defalcation in the Concord Bank, where the elder Trask had been one of the tellers.

Since he does not have sufficient funds to complete his course at college, Philip accepts the offer of a clerical position in a railway office in Kansas City, toward which section of the country a great migration is in progress, following perfervid accounts in the newspapers of a great silver discovery in the locality.

The author, continuing his way over this time-worn plot, has Philip believe implicitly in his father's innocence, although all the facts in the case point unquestionably to the elder Trask's guilt. It is a weak point, at best not happily made, but it gives Philip a reason for going so far from home for a clerical job, for in the West, ever a port of missing men, he may find his father and so solve the mystery of his disappearance.

Searching for missing men, however, requires time and money, and Philip has neither. The author assists him in obtaining these essentials by inspiring the young man to relinquish his clerking activities and go prospecting. This Philip does forthwith, emerging the following Summer as part owner of a rich claim, and a wealthy man.

Now the question remains as to how to free this heroic young person from his narrow code of ethics, and bring about the completion of the story. The author accomplishes this by the simple if trite expedient of disillusioning the young man concerning his father's implication in the Concord Bank affair. For Philip comes upon his father, engaged as a faro dealer in a gambling house. The elder Trask admits having stolen the money. He further informs his son that he had lived a double life at home and had taken his mistress with him when he left—was, in fact, living with her at that moment.

Philip's faith is naturally quite shattered by this terrific disillusionment. The distraught young man, who until now boasted a narrow, uncompromising morality, is turned by his father's revelations into a path of reckless dissipation which almost destroys him, but through which, nevertheless, he learns a new tolerance and a new charity.

A RARE BOOK MYSTERY

THE COLFAX BOOK-PLATE. By Agnes Miller. New York: The Century Company. $2.

ALTHOUGH the title page of this novel tells one unmistakably that it is a mystery story, the book is interesting from the beginning for reasons quite apart from the mystery it contains. For, in common with many of the best of mystery tales, it opens as though it might turn out to be a novel of character or of social life; and not until after many pages, when one has had time to acquaint one's self with the background and some of the chief dramatis personæ, does the narrative definitely enter those channels of mystery which it follows to the end.

As the title implies, the story is largely concerned with an enigmatical book-plate. A young employe of a New York store is sent off in quest of rare books, and at length purchases, at an enormous price, an antique law volume thought to contain a famous and valuable book-plate. At the same time he discovers that two other persons are much interested in the dusty old tome, one of them being a rather fashionable-looking young man and the other a girl of peculiar attractiveness—and for some unknown reason the girl seems distressingly anxious that the man should not gain possession of the volume. Subsequently, after the young book clerk has made the purchase, there are some curious attempts to steal the treasure, and these attempts seem altogether more determined than its value would warrant; and a little while later there is even a murderous assault connected with some ancient scientific instrument whose nature is not at first apparent.

Of the unraveling of the mystery, it need only be said that it is ultimately worked out to the satisfaction of most parties concerned, the reader included. Miss Miller has given us a mystery story written with rather more vim and zest than the average, and making more agreeable reading than nine out of ten books of the type.

AN IRISH WOLFHOUND

THE ODYSSEY OF BORU. By J. Allan Dunn. Illustrated by Edwin Megargee. Introduction by J. E. de Mund. 196 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

NO dog lover who sees the appealing head of Boru, big gray Irish wolfhound, on the jacket of Mr. Dunn's book but will at once plunge into the story. And as a story he will find it a very good tale, having most of the elements that go to the making of an interesting novel. It is a dog story almost wholly, and the humans who enter into it are subordinate in importance to the account of Boru and his wide wanderings and varied experiences. In his introduction Mr. de Mund, President of the American Kennel Club, vouches for the essential truth of Mr. Dunn's depiction of his hero. "There is," he says, "no questioning the fact that Boru is a real dog—an Irish wolfhound that could have been created only by one who knows the breed."

When Boru is introduced to the reader he has fallen to a low estate, for he is a member of a dog troupe in a shabby little circus touring the logging camps of the Northwest. But his breed was of the noblest and back not many months in his history he had won prizes for his mistress in the New York shows. And his trainer said of him: "A man is usually only 40 per cent. human, an' damn few of them is thoro'breds. But a dog is generally all dog, and Boru—bless the Irish name of him—is a 101 per cent. 'Tis a shame to make a trick mutt out of him." But he did not stay a "trick mutt" long. He escaped and went wild, roaming the mountains and winning a white she-wolf for his mate. Mr. Dunn tells very beautifully the story of their primeval love and devotion and its tragic end. But Boru's odyssey does not end with it. His roaming life brings him many adventures, temporary friendships with man, hatreds between him and man that almost cause his death, and at last the sound of a girl's voice that wakens vague memories and sets him upon the trail that ends in home and devotion to the one human being who has aroused his uttermost loyalty.

Mr. Dunn carries an admirable balance between his interesting story, with its invigorating breath of mountains and plains and outdoor life, and the psychological depiction and interpretation of his dog hero. Nor does he make the mistake of too many of those who write about animals, of transferring to his wolf-hound hero the feelings and reactions of human beings. He seems to have penetrated, as nearly as is possible for the human animal to do so, the mind and heart of the dog animal and to have given a true report, without exaggeration of either thought or emotion, of the stirrings and impulses that moved his hero to action. His Boru is a splendid creature that any dog lover would like to call his own.

ISLAND ADVENTURE

THE MISSING ISLAND. By Oswald Kendall. 302 pp. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

A TALE of romantic seafaring men who chase the ignis fatuus of adventure to some mysterious pin-prick on the map of a great ocean must inevitably draw comparisons with the daddy of all such yarns, "Treasure Island." And "The Missing Island," Oswald Kendall's latest essay in this ever-popular genre, fails lamentably when placed beside the Stevenson book. One simply cannot imagine a youngster of 12 sitting up at night to finish it on some occasion when his mother is away from home.

The action of "The Missing Island" is scarcely copious enough to make bones for a good short story. Briefly, it involves a trip to an island that has been left off the maps by a Captain Hawks, Grummet, his mate, and a number of other people. The party loses its ship through fire off the coast of the island, and in attempting to make a landing in a launch is caught by a tidal wave and deposited far up on the shore.

Stranded on the island, Grummet, the mate, and Wilfred, the cook, set out to find the immense raft of lumber for which the party has come in search. When they do discover it they are amazed to find a Chilean has happened on it before. This South American and his brother have sailed from Chile as captain and mate respectively of an ocean-going tug.

The brother, a scoundrel, has put the captain ashore and written in the log of the tug: "Captain overboard." But Captain Hawks, who has no need of any money, anyway, listens to the tale of his Chilean confrère, signals the ocean-going tug when it approaches the raft, goes aboard and accuses the scoundrel mate.

And then everything ends all right.

Perhaps the action would serve for a good sea story of the novel length, but Mr. Kendall has made it seem otherwise by failing to do anything in the way of characterization. His Captain Hawks is not distinguished by idiosyncrasy or reality. Grummet the mate, through whose mouth the tale is told, is never more than a name. That is, never more than a symbol for verbosity.

RUSSIAN DAYS

THIS "Russian story of revolutionary days" throbs with "danger and daring," with quick, cinematographic actions, with "terrible" revolutionists, with streams of blood and with melodramatic effects.

It would be unjust to think that Mr. Gielgud has not taken pains to saturate his novel with Russian atmosphere. Indeed, has he not filled it with Russian names, patronymics, costumes, details, &c.? How unfortunate are, however, some of these Russianisms! Thus, for instance, the Russian ear shrinks in horror at hearing of Prince Gurka (no Russian princely name has ever had the ending "ka" or "ko") or of Count Fodcustomer some of the things he had sold him, years before, for a song. He went down to see him, found him still alive, hale and hearty—but blind. And the dealer learned from the old man's family that because the war had impoverished them they had been forced to sell most of the valuable things in the old man's collection. The man himself, being blind, did not know this. And the art dealer had to sit by him while he turned the pages of many portfolios, glowing with pride over pictures that actually were not there.

Herr Zweig has used, of course, a situation inherently pathetic, and he has used it with lightness and charm. He has touched on his situation rather than sounded it, as readers will agree who remember Leonard Merrick's amazing "The Laureis and the Lady," where a blind poet is made to believe that his poems, which really have never been published, have created a sensation in the world. Merrick plays his situation to the hilt, gaining for it a very full pathos and irony. Herr Zweig, in "The Invisible Collection," simply writes with a quiet tenderness.

A word remains to be added concerning the distinctive make-up of this little book. The Pynson Printers have given it a most attractive letter-press and binding, printed it on beautiful paper and enriched it with five or six individual woodcuts by Joseph Mulay.

STUDY OF FOUR WOMEN

RETURN TO BONDAGE. By Barbara Blackburn. 333 pp. New York: The Dial Press. $3.

MISS BLACKBURN'S novel is the sort, one can predict with fair safety, that will cause little comment in America and will be read by no great number of American readers. It is very English, very unexciting and very "colorless." Even an intelligent reader, brought face to face with its unexaggerated detail of British life, could hardly be blamed for regarding it as somewhat dull and trivial. It is a record of surfaces mainly, and perhaps it demands a certain degree of reflection on the reader's part to perceive that the surfaces conceal depths. For the depths are revealed casually, and are never in themselves striking. Character here is revealed through incidents and manners more than through analysis, and the character revealed is normal, usual, average. Miss Blackburn emphasizes nothing. Her material includes no extremes. Her method resorts to no extremes. The life she treats of has no high picturesque moments, goes on without any pointed climaxes. Its crises are represented by pauses, not by crashing chords. It is distinctly not popular fiction.

"Return to Bondage" is, instead, a psychological study of four women, two mothers and two daughters. In neither framework nor style is the book to be identified with the strictly modern novel of psychology; the structure is the loose and natural structure peculiar to the whole English tradition of fiction; the style the easy, capable, articulate utterance of a thousand British novels. The opening scene, describing a dance and introducing us to all but one of the important characters of the book, might, with the lapse in manners of a hundred years, be a scene from one of Jane Austen's novels. It creates the same atmosphere, has the same naturalness, the same colorless and undramatic reality. But soon enough, having met the characters, we see what "Return to Bondage" is all about and is all going to be about; we see the clash between two generations, between two kinds of temperament. Mrs. Rivers and Mrs. Oliphant are good conventional well-bred Englishwomen, leading lives bounded by their homes and families. Joan Rivers and Laura Oliphant, their daughters, are young, unsatisfied, unorientated, inclined toward rebellion. They want life, they want love. And they go forth to have both.

Their mothers give no orders; they try to persuade, to understand. They do not understand very well, any more than their daughters. Moving from the country to London, the two girls try jobs, meet young men, shilly-shally. Laura at length marries and lives with a nice enough, but extremely uncomprehending and manlike husband who cannot adequately support her. She settles down, at length, to a life of infinite compromises and few compensations. Joan, after being one man's mistress, after finding life pointless and rather unkind, decides to became another man's wife—it happens to be Laura's brother—and make the best of things in a fairly happy domestic existence which, with time, will not greatly differ from her mother's.

Miss Blackburn's novel is distinguished for its fidelity to life. She knows her people, inside and out, and they are none of them particularly individual. Her conclusions, in their lack of hope or promise, are inexpungable, except perhaps that Joan and Laura, in their youth, take life a little more seriously and regard it a little less sanguinely than they might. Adjustment, for them, has not yet brought its own compensations. The people in this novel are clear and comprehensible rather than graphic and alive; Miss Blackburn is not adept at investing her characters with vividness. Altogether the book is quiet, human, understanding. It is in no sense a great book, and even those who find it ringing true may find it from time to time a little dull in the reading. For embellishments there are none, dramatic, poetic or colorful. It is a subdued, not a bright picture; and the picture has no frame.

HUMOROUS STORIES

28 HUMOROUS STORIES, OLD AND NEW. By Twenty and Eight Authors. Edited by Ernest Rhys and C. A. Dawson-Scott. 342 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.50.

THE editors of this book of short stories have endeavored to select for it tales that have "real salt" in them, whose humor is not merely amusing for a day or a season or even a year, but is likely to have as much permanence as humor can be expected to have in a changing world. "Our narrative comedians," they say, "have been put into a prose pageant which represents yesterday and today and leaves the Comic Muse to act as umpire." A selection from one of Joseph C. Lincoln's Cape Cod novels leads their pageant and an O. Henry story ends it. In between are represented Mark Twain and Charles Lever, Stephen Leacock, Arnold Bennett, George Ade, F. Anstey, Laurence Housman, Thomas Hood, W. W. Jacobs, P. G. Wodehouse, Jerome K. Jerome, Anthony Hope, and fourteen others. It is a merry company, with such variety of styles, ideas and spirits as frees the book from the suggestion of monotony that usually accompanies collections of a single literary category. The editors have been wise and careful and notably discriminating in making the selections.

WITCHERY OF MUSIC

THE MAD-SONG. By Mabel Wagnalls. 250 pp. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Company. $2.

THE pivotal idea of Mabel Wagnalls's novel, "The Mad-Song," is the witchery and mystery of music which, when wedded to love, produces a power beyond compute. Upon this theme the author has embroidered a fantastic, improbable story, with unlife-like characters that are merely symbols of human qualities. If one accepts it in this light the tale is mildly amusing. But, if viewed seriously, it verges perilously upon the ludicrous.

The principal protagonists are twin sisters, so identical in feature and lineament that their closest friends cannot tell them apart. This fortuitous resemblance blazes the way for countless preposterous situations. And, since the girls are Russians, all the idiosyncracies and vagaries of the Muscovite character are permissible.

Pietro Donimiraki's motherless daughters, Katelka and Karina, are super-musicians—one a pianist, the other a singer. To Karina, who seems doomed for sorrow, music is at once happiness, balm for a broken heart, means for support and, finally, the road to the supreme tragedy. And to Katelka music brings tribulation, the unlocking of prison doors and, ultimately, love. The melody responsible for all these things is that favorite war horse of every would-be prima donna, the "Mad Song" from Ambroise Thomas's opera "Hamlet." This mediocre composition, with its trick coloratura hurdles, is Karina's artistic tour de force, while Katelka is unable to give it voice until, prodded by despair, she suddenly discovers the technical secret of its hitherto baffling trills and roulades.

Early in the action Pietro Donimiraki dies, whereupon the guileless Katelka travels all the way to Milan to visit the Contessa Maria Vanioli. Not that she personally knew the contessa; her father, himself, for that matter, had met the lady only once:

> It had occurred in Paris, where Pietro had rescued a small dog from the hoofs of a runaway team. On restoring the dog to its alarmed owner, he had made the pleasant discovery that he was addressing a lady of title. She had offered him her purse, which he refused. Thereupon the lady impulsively wrote a few lines on her card, saying:
> "Here is my permanent address. If ever in your life I can do anything for you, just present the card at my door."

When Katelka finally does present it, she learns that the contessa has been dead twelve years. But this contretemps does not daunt her, and the very same day she makes the acquaintance of Mrs. Rutherford Avery, a wealthy American parvenu, who instantly takes a fancy to the girl. Twenty-four hours later the long-lost Karina suddenly appears in Milan; Karina, the "greatest singer in the world," who had disappeared after her elopement with the Russian painter, Feodor. She is now a widow, her husband having been deported to Siberia, where he had been devoured by wolves on his way to a lifelong exile.

To introduce Katelka to the artistic coterie of Milan, Mrs. Avery gives a musicale at her villa. Karina comes to the musicale in Katelka's stead, and her remarkable resemblance to her sister deceives every one. She meets Count Leonine Domar, the very man responsible for her husband's exile to Siberia. Domar is an unpleasant, exotic creature with a queer taste in wines. "Bring me your oldest Veuve Cliquot," he commands, "packed away forty years—from the furthest depths of the cellar." The author is apparently ignorant that even the best champagne goes stale after twenty years.

Count Domar is mysteriously poisoned and the elusive Karina again vanishes. Katelka, imprisoned for the murder, escapes the extreme penalty of the law by a most impossible trick. In fact, the book is so packed with improbabilities that the author must have written it with her tongue in her cheek. The pages are peppered with Italian phrases, so many of which are incorrect that it is only charitable to lay the blame for them upon a careless proofreading of the galleys.

TWELVE SHORT STORIES

WORD OF HONOUR. By H. C. McNeile (Sapper). 305 pp. New York: The George H. Doran Company. $2.

THE name of H. C. McNeile has become so intimately associated with that of his most famous character, that it will be a matter of surprise to many of his readers to find in his new volume of short stories no mention whatever of "Bulldog Drummond." To some readers the absence of that redoubtable hero will, perhaps, be a disappointment, but it may well be that to others it will be a relief, for the Bulldog was growing just a wee bit tiresome. The present volume shows that Mr. McNeile's talents are more varied than the Drummond stories would lead one to suspect.

There are twelve stories in this collection, and each of them is good of its kind. The first is a simple love story built around the familiar theme of a man risking his honor to save the girl he loves. It is from this tale that the book takes its title. The second deals with telepathic communication between two loving souls

In the Days When the Clipper Ships Sailed for the China Sea

THE LENORE. A Maritime Chronicle. By Terence O'Donnell. 325 pp. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

ONE is at a loss in classifying "The Lenore," which the author, Terence O'Donnell, calls "A Maritime Chronicle," although the work is clearly fiction, and, in more respects than one, an abortive novel. We do not know who Mr. O'Donnell is, nor what furnished the inspiration for this strange and, in more ways than one, impressive work. We take it that among the author's forebears were clipper-ship masters, or clipper-ship owners, or both, and that years of pondering on family tradition led him to undertake a narrative reconstructive of those spanking days when America's merchant marine swept the seas. Mr. O'Donnell does not attempt to be a Conrad; there is no effort to take Conrad's point of view, or even to imitate the Conradian manner. Rather, the author of "The Lenore" appears to have gone to Herman Melville, and specifically to "Moby Dick," to learn the art of sea narration. He writes with something of Melville's objectivity, and the underlying philosophy is nearer Melville's than Conrad's. Morgan Robertson also seems to have been among O'Donnell's masters.

Chronicle, then, or novel, as one will, "The Lenore" is a book deserving of attention. Two characters, two concurrent lives, hold the parts together; two lives, and, of course, the great ship herself, the Lenore. The two persons of the narrative are Peleg Parker, master of the clipper, and his son, Calvin Parker. The vessel is the fastest and the finest of the tea-clippers, those loftily sparred and vastly canvased ocean thoroughbreds which raced their cargoes from Pagoda Anchorage to Boston Light.

Mr. O'Donnell has drawn his figure of Captain Parker full-bodied, in bold lines. The son, Calvin, is sensitive, artistic, a student, a musician. Calvin's mother is cold, an aristocrat. The family mansion, as is fitting for a sea lord, is on the slope of Beacon Hill. Contrasts here in abundance. Captain Parker, true to tradition, has a wife in every port, and when he ships his son Calvin as a foremast-hand on the Lenore it is not merely with the idea of making a man of him; he has also a deeper, a somewhat sinister purpose. He intends that Calvin shall become acquainted with his mulatto half-brother in Barbados and his Chinese half-brother in Canton. Captain Parker, as he says of himself, is a man who has worked hard, drunk hard, and lusted hard. The author, although he does not strew his pages with profanity, makes no effort to dilute the Captain's vocabulary, robust with the robustness of our Anglo-Saxon sea, and decorated with those Chaucerian and Shakespearean epithets revived with such gusto by modern playrights.

It will be seen, therefore, that Mr. O'Donnell has laid out a very full program for himself, and one which, as events prove, he is not quite able to fulfill. Calvin is never a fully defined figure, for the reason, as it seemed to the reviewer, that the author is so much more interested in Captain Peleg—as who would not be—that only by exerting effort can he get the father into the background and the boy into the foreground. The trouble, of course, goes deep; Mr. O'Donnell never made the novelist's decision—he did not decide at the outset which was to be the centre of interest, father or son. A novel divided against itself shall not stand.

The sweep of Mr. O'Donnell's narrative is, perhaps, its most impressive feature. It was a vision of interminable ocean reaches, of far and strange lands, which animated Boston merchants and Boston owners in the spacious decade between 1850 and 1860; and if they built, manned and raced their clippers primarily for gain, as, of course, they did, that does not lessen the fact that they were Elizabethans in spirit, for nothing less than the round globe itself was the field of their operations and their playground. Whatever his measure of success, Mr. O'Donnell has seen the opportunity for literary exploitation in America's great romantic period.

The Illustrations Are From Woodcuts for "The Lenore."

In "The Lenore" the author has essayed two or three big scenes, two or three seascapes of proportion. To the present writer, while he acknowledges their effectiveness, they were not wholly convincing. Mr. O'Donnell has, of necessity, built on the work of others, and he appears to lack sufficient experience of the sea and of ships to know when he was building incorrectly. His story of the great hurricane (when Calvin saves the ship in true Robertsonian fashion by cutting away some of the upper spars) does not check in all particulars with the physical laws of hurricanes as laid down in the standard textbooks on navigation. And when he endeavors to picture the destruction of the clipper by fire off Barbados he commits one very curious mistake. The Lenore, being a wooden vessel, could, to be sure, burn to the water's edge, after which she would become a derelict. But the hull would not sink. Mr. O'Donnell, unfortunately for that artistic veracity which should be the aim of a writer of historical fiction, has the clipper plunge downward by the head, as if she were a steel ship, her rudder "flapping madly in the air." This last is actually grotesque, for the diabolical forces that could make the heavy planking of the huge rudder perform a dance of death could only have originated with the author himself. In all other respects, however, the burning of the vessel is a fine and moving bit of descriptive writing, with a touch of the macabre in the tolling of the ship's bell as the abandoned hull lurches from side to side.

Closing the covers of "The Lenore," the reviewer finds himself divided in his judgment. He is glad not to have missed the book, but it is more the conception of the narrative than the narrative itself which has impressed him. The chronicler has steered a blundering course. The story is a synthesis; and, clearly, the alchemy which would have fused the many components was not at the author's command. But the pen portrait of Captain Peleg Parker is an addition to the New England section of the American gallery; and the book, for all its blundering, a more than commendable effort to bring to life a golden age.

THE GREEK IDYLS. Theocritus, Bion, Moschus. Rendered into English verse forms by Marion Mills Miller, Litt. D. With a critical introduction by David Moore Robinson, Ph. D. 340 pp. Boston: Limited. Lexington, Ky.: The Maxwelton Company.

By PERCY A. HUTCHISON

DR. MARION MILLS MILLER is among those benefactors of the human race who seldom if ever receive their just due. Dr. Miller belongs to the tribe of translators, of whom unthinking persons are wont to say lightly, Why don't they do original work? If there were more good translations of work that is actually great, and less original work that is mediocre (as a vast deal of it), literary standards would be immeasurably raised and the opportunity improved for the establishing of wider literary contacts.

Obviously, the field of translation is twofold—modern and ancient. And if rendition of the modern seems of greater attractiveness, it must not be forgotten that rendition of the ancient offers just as much of adventure, and offers more in the way of enrichment of backgrounds. Dr. Miller, who is a scholar of note, has so far confined himself to the ancients, and is, we imagine, likely to continue to do so. Something over a year ago, in collaboration with Professor David Moore Robinson of Johns Hopkins University, Dr. Miller brought out his translation into English verse forms of the fragments of the poetry of Sappho. This valuable work he now follows with renditions into verse of the "Idyls" of the Greek poets Theocritus, Bion and Moschus. Professor Robinson has written a critical introduction for the volume. Fortunately, the work of these Greek romantic poets—for so they may be called—suffered in survival no such catastrophe as befell the love verses of the poetess of Lesbos; in Dr. Miller's volume will be found thirty poems by Theocritus, and twenty-six epigrams; fourteen lyrics by Bion, and by Moschus seven. Many of the poems run to considerable length. On the score of quantity alone, then, these poets form an addition to one's library. Of their importance, more will be said.

If the name of Theocritus is not known to every schoolboy—and because of the general neglect of Greek in modern education it probably is not—the name of John Milton assuredly is. Milton did not translate Theocritus; there is, however, an English paraphrasing or rendering by one Joseph Barnes, dated 1588. But Milton, as every schoolboy knows, wrote the elegy "Lycidas," and this he never would have done but for Theocritus, Bion and, especially, Moschus. The latter's elegy on the death of Bion ("Lament for Bion") became the model for a romantic type of elegy of which "Lycidas" and Shelley's "Adonais" are the two great examples in English literature. The name Lycidas which Milton gives to his dead friend, Edward King, is the name of a shepherd in one of the idyls of Theocritus, and although Milton borrowed more directly from Ovid—who had in turn borrowed from Theocritus—there is every evidence that the English poet was well acquainted with the lyrical work of the Greek poet.

For those who use the word "classical" to apply broadly to everything Greek or Latin, and who take the position that the "romantic" did not appear in literature until comparatively recent times, the present writer's application of the word "romantic" to the Greek idylists will appear unscholarly and unwarranted. It was used avowedly, and as a challenge to such opinion. It was not until the Sicilian Greeks, Theocritus, Bion and Moschus (third to perhaps the first century B. C.) that any such passages as the following, with their observation of nature and their feeling for nature, found a place in literature.

Spring, Spring every where! Pastures green,
Udders adrip with the spoils they bear.

Or this, with its praise of shepherd life:

Turn
Hither thy feet, and they shall tread the softness of the fern.
And bruise the bloom of odorous mint; with the goatskins, softer still
Than thy best fleeces, will I strow thy resting place; and fill
To Pan eight bowls with milk, and eight with honey in the comb.

Or, still again, this, which many commentators regard as perhaps the finest thing of its kind in pastoral poetry:

I sang. He gave me with his merry laugh,
Pledge of the Muses' brotherhood, his staff,
Toward Pyxe on the left his way he beat;
Onward to old Lycoreus' farm we sped—
Amyntas fair, and Eucritus, and I—
And there couched on sweet mastic did we lie,
And new-strip vine-leaves. Arching overhead
Thick boughs of elms and poplar-trees were spread.
Hard by, from out the Nymphs' own cave, did fall
The sacred stream with murmur musical.
On shadowed boughs the burnt cicalas plied
Their noisy task; deep in the thorn-brake cried
A little owl; doves moaned, and larks did sing;
And banded bees flew buzzing round the Spring.
All breathed the scent the harvest season bears;
Beneath us, round us, apples rolled, and pears,
And wild plums weighed the slender branches low;
And wine-jars lost the seals of long ago.

How is it that a touch so modern is to be found in poetry which actually belongs to antiquity? The answer—and to perceive the answer is, perhaps, not the least of the many reasons for reading Dr. Miller's "The Greek Idyls"—is that these pastoral poets, or idylists, were themselves the first "moderns." The golden age of Greek literature had passed before Theocritus, Bion and Moschus appear on the scene. The Homeric heroes, the personages of Greek drama, had been either legendary characters or historical figures of a time long antedating the age which immortalized them. To all they must have seemed somewhat dim by the time the third century had rolled around. Moreover, to the Dorian Greeks of Syracuse, in Sicily, who had once repelled an Athenian invasion, the dramatists of Athens may never have loomed with overwhelming importance. All considered, then, the time was ripe for a new note in literature, a "modern" note. And what more natural than that it should have been sounded among a people more loving of their ease, more simple-minded, more closely in contact with nature, than were the Athenians of the time of Pericles?

There was, to be sure, at this time in Alexandria, then the centre of culture of the known world, a city of close to a million inhabitants, a "school" of poetry which one might, if one chose, call "new." But it was poetry of artificiality, of sophistication; in short, it was poetry of "the town." In his latter years Theocritus journeyed to Alexandria, where he gave himself over to the writing of this kind of verse. That it was immeasurably inferior to the spontaneous, joyous and what may truly be called affectionate poetry of his youth scarcely need be said. When Milton takes over into his poetry goatherds and Doric country maidens, and the entire panoply of Sicilian landscape, he assumes, of course, a certain literary pose. But there is nothing of pose in Theocritus. His Lycidas not only is a goatherd, he is also his own friend. Amaryllis and Neaera are farmers' daughters. Those who have compared the shepherds and shepherdesses of Theocritus to those painted by Watteau probably never read Theocritus. The Greek pastoral poet touches the soil at every point. Let one take his description of his friend Lycidas and one will see how far is Theocritus removed from Watteau—or, rather, how far is Watteau removed from Theocritus:

Ere one the journey's midway point might pass,
Or yet descry the tomb of Brasilas,
We by the favor of the Muses came Upon a traveler, Lycidas by name,
From Cydon, and a goatherd good and true,
Whom none could e'er mistake, for through and through
All things about him "goatherd" did bespeak;
His coarse cloak was a tawny goat-skin, reek
Of rennet still upon it; and he wore
A blouse broad-belted; in his hand he bore,
Cut from an olive-copse, a crooked staff

Dr. Samuel Johnson could say of Milton's "Lycidas" that it was "easy, vulgar and therefore disgusting." Fortunately for English literature, few, if any (except Boswell), have ever given much heed to the arrogant criticisms handed left and right by the Lexicographer, to whom Milton and the Elizabethan may be imagined as saying, "You define the words, Old Thing, and we'll use them!" It is fortunate, however, that Theocritus first fell into the hands of Master Joseph Barnes of Oxford, in 1588, and not into the hands of Dr. Johnson of London, a century and a half later.

There seems to be some confusion among scholars as to whether Bion or Moschus was born first; but if Moschus's "Lament for Bion" is genuinely by that poet, as again some scholars doubt, then Moschus must have outlived Bion. Of course, if the "Lament" is not by Moschus the added difficulty arises of finding an author to whom it may be ascribed. However, it is not necessary to confuse one's self with the troubles of the scholars; this much is certain, Bion and Moschus (and perhaps a third poet whose works became confused with those by Moschus) lived in Sicily either contemporaneously with Theocritus or not long after. And, being attracted by the pastoral note Theocritus had sounded with such fullness of beauty, they set out to follow him as their master in art. It happens occasionally that a pupil surpasses the master; but such was not the case with these two, with the exception of the one poem, the "Lament." This poem is in fact so beautiful that it might well have been by Theocritus himself. Indeed, if the present writer did not fear that too much of the evidences were against him, he would advance a daring theory to solve the riddle of authorship—to wit, that the elegy is actually the work of Theocritus. The poet Theocritus appears to have been called by certain of the ancients "Moschus," which leaves only the name "Bion" to be accounted for. This is easily done by assuming it to have been the name of a shepherd friend of Theocritus or "Moschus." But the reader is more likely to be interested in the poem itself than in theories of authorship.

The elegy consists of more than thirty stanzas, for the most part of six lines, and a two-line refrain which occurs at intervals. Dr. Miller has taken certain liberties with the refrain, expanding the single line,

Begin, ye Sicilian Muses, begin the dirge,

into

O Muses dear of Dorian Sicily,
Begin the dirge, sweet Bion's threnody!

And these lines he varies slightly in order to vary the monotony. Whether the translator is justified in such a change the reader will decide for himself. The present writer has on more than one occasion gone on record as strongly against any "dressing up" in rendering from one literature to another. For this stand he has been taken to task. But he remains unconvinced. In the body of the poem Dr. Miller has followed his original with admirable fidelity.

The threnody begins with an apostrophe to the scenes amid which Bion lived.

Woll, woodland glades and wells on Aetna steep!
For Lovely Bion dead, lament, ye rills!
O green things that he loved, your poet weep!
Recall him, lowly weeds and lofty hills!
Ye flowers that once he incline in wreaths of bay,
With heads adroop breathe now your lives away!

From this more general invocation the poet proceeds to call on various flowers individually, and on the nightingale, and the white swans on Strymon's lake, and, this part of the poem completed, the poet then describes how nature is mourning Bion.

Silent amid the mountains Echo grieves
That thou art gone who gave to her a tongue;
Their fruits the trees cast; withered are their leaves;
The fading flowers in grief their heads have hung;

Painting the Cowboy in True Colors

THE COWBOY AND HIS INTERPRETERS. By Douglas Branch. Illustrated by Will James, Joe de Yong, Charles M. Russell. 278 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.50.

MR. BRANCH has written as comprehensive and informing a book about this one-time institution of our Western life and apparently perennial institution of our literature as there is likely to be. His work is the more useful in preserving the real cowboy for a later day because he considers not only the cowboy as he actually was but compares his reality with what has been written about him and tries to strip away from these printed portrayals some of the absurdities, the myths, the untruths that have grown up around his engaging figure. First locating him in his birthplace, Southern Texas, immediately after the end of the Civil War, Mr. Branch traces the growth and development of the cowboy with the great cattle drives to the north over the Chisholm and other trails, the spreading of the cattle business over the Northwest, the troubles between big and little cattlemen and between sheep and cattle growers. He tells how the cowboy lived in camp, what he ate and how he dressed, how he loved certain fineries and conventionalized clothing, such as tight boots and silver spurs, how he treated his horses and how they treated him, how he lived and worked during the round-up and the long drive and how he amused himself at the end. There is a chapter on cowboy songs and another on the tales and traditions that were passed around and handed on as the cowboys gathered around their campfire after supper and talked of cowboy deeds that had required surpassing strength and courage. Through all these chapters the author draws much on what has been written about the cowboy and his life by those who observed him when he was in his prime and by an occasional cowboy author.

When he comes to the cowboy in literature—"Alkali Ike in Belles-Lettres"—Mr. Branch ridicules, deplores, tolerates and sometimes approves. He has read widely in this branch of American fiction and narrative, from the dime novels of the earlier day to the fiction of the present time. For the greater part of it he has little regard, because of its lack of fidelity, its frills and trimmings and its misconceptions and misrepresentations. To Andy Adams's "The Log of a Cowboy" he gives the praise of being "the finest piece of literature that the cattle country has produced." If he thinks so little of the cowboy in books Mr. Branch thinks still less of the portrayal he gets in the movies.

This Is an Age of Literary Transition, Not Chaos

Edwin Muir in a New Volume of Essays Revives the Forgotten Evocative Functions of Criticism

TRANSITION, ESSAYS ON CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE. By Edwin Muir. New York: The Viking Press. $3.

CRITICAL ESSAYS. By Osbert Burdett. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $3.

By HENRY JAMES FORMAN

MR. MUIR is the sort of critic who accustoms us to look for meaning in writers and for their significance to their age. Have our present-day writers any such significance? This critic being an Englishman, deals unfortunately only with English writers. How illuminating could be his readings of Dreiser, of Lewis, of Sherwood Anderson! He confines himself exclusively, however, to such subjects as Joyce Lawrence, Virginia Woolf, Stephen Hudson, Huxley and Strachey. But even so, we cannot but be intensely grateful.

Comment upon books is as common as criticism is rare. But Mr. Muir happens to be one of those infrequent critics who lets in a window into the mind and soul of the author. The glimpse is not only interesting but at times startling. And it is conceivable that the author himself, peering in at the window opened by Mr. Muir, will be surprised, amazed even. That author will be haunted by a feeling that he has seen himself in a new way—possibly as posterity is going to see him.

This is an age of transition. Few of us will disagree. The Elizabethan age, the Johnsonian, "were ages in which certain orders of values were accepted, ages which had an image of the cosmos (for example, the biblical image) society, morality, destiny, of what was wise and desirable, possible and impossible."

In ages of transition, on the other hand, everything makes the writer more uncertain, saps his faith, only nourished from hi...self, and gives his work an air either of vacillation or of violence.

Starting with these premises, Mr. Muir proceeds to his task of analysis. And the chief fact he notes about such writers as Joyce, Lawrence, Mrs. Woolf, Hudson and Huxley is their marked originality. They have sought, he observes, to bring new provinces of experience into fiction, to experiment with new forms. "Their attitude is essentially different from that of Fielding and Thackeray setting out to paint a picture of society, or Dickins and Scott telling a human tale."

In the lack of living models, in the discard of old conventions, these various departures of writers become "an unconscious attempt to find a way out of the chaos, to discover a convention and found a new order." Now, all these writers may, apparently, with their strange new devices and methods be creating a greater chaos—temporarily. Some of us think they are achieving precisely that. Not so Mr. Muir.

For the literature of transition, unsatisfying as it is, has brought new possibilities of the mind to light, has made certain things conscious which before were unconscious; and no novelist will be able in future to write as if that literature had never existed. In that lies its abundant justification.

Take the case of D. H. Lawrence. This not very powerful intellect, presents one striking quality, "a kind of splendor, not of the spirit, nor of the mind, but of the senses and the instincts." We smell and touch the objects he describes.

And he makes us feel such things as heat and cold, growth and decay, more vividly than any other writer. He hates the intellect when it is free and working by its own laws, for he wishes it to be an extension, perhaps a sublimation of the instincts. He shows us one marvelous province of life, but not, like the great artists, life itself.

In a way, in short, Lawrence has rediscovered the instincts beneath the layers upon layers that civilization has superimposed upon them. And to this limited extent, declares Mr. Muir, Lawrence has written "more greatly than any other English writer of his time."

Now, a view like this of Lawrence is, the humble reviewer submits, of priceless value. We all have our various opinions of Lawrence, but the general reader, even if intelligent, cannot but be bewildered. This clarifying analysis of Mr. Muir's may not be the final one. But no reader aware of it but will henceforth read a writer like Lawrence, almost indiscriminately praised or damned, with greater mental alertness and understanding. That is one of the windows I spoke of. And if we cannot get from a critic light, then we can get nothing. From Muir, however, we always get light.

Or take a writer like Aldous Huxley. There is a class of writers who tell us that what is the matter with us today is not our soul but our liver. Of this class is Aldous Huxley. "It is a hit-or-miss diagnosis, as true, perhaps, as Mr. Coué's, but as one-sided and essentially of the same order." No one can read Mr. Huxley without a certain pleasure, but it is obvious that to take him seriously as a great novelist is impossible. His style, agrees Mr. Muir, is supple, natural, felicitous; but he has never expressed in it a profound truth nor described with it a living character. The humours, the lusts, the hypocrisies, the snobberies—he discovers them all there, and he portrays them. But they remain disembodied.

The critic's paper on Huxley is brief, but, like all the rest, it is searching. Huxley has come to have a certain influence upon some of the younger writers. In he or is he not important? Mr. Muir readily admits the influence and gives his reasons why he does not believe him to be important. In speaking later of the poetry of Mr. T. S. Eliot, Mr. Muir observes:

Disdain for life, loneliness of soul, the sardonic gesture, the mysterious sorrow—all these are in Mr. Eliot's poetry. They are also in Mr. Huxley's novels, they have been called the spirit of the age, and it is impossible to take them seriously.

Indeed, Muir feels about T. S. Eliot almost as he feels about Huxley. This still young poet occupies a place of very decided influence among the younger writers of England. "In one way Mr. Eliot is the most complete critic of our time," declares Mr. Muir, but he cannot read into him the greatness that some devotees, young and older, have read into Eliot.

To James Joyce, Mr. Muir gives more space than to most of the others. He is not blind to the faults of such a book as "Ulysses," but he takes it nevertheless very seriously:

"Ulysses" showed the direction in which literature for ten years had been moving; it showed also the direction, or rather some of the directions, in which—who knows for how long?—it will move. . . . Analysing "Ulysses" one might have drawn a chart of the future of literature, showing not only what would be attempted but also what with good luck would be achieved. . . . He has revealed the swarming world of subconscious and half-conscious thoughts which constitute three-fourths of our life, and he has shown that it has a magical and excessive beauty. In hardly any other work of modern times is there such an overpowering sense of the inexhaustibility of human life.

High as some of us would consider this praise to be, the mere fact that Mr. Muir gives it is of grave importance. It has been said that at no time was there more legitimate ground for possible censorship by the police than in the case of "Ulysses." Mr. Muir, one need hardly say, is not considering it in that light. But his judgment of it is arresting. He looks upon it as a peak and a beginning.

After reading a book like Muir's, the transition to a volume of critical essays like those of Mr. Osbert Burdett's is like going back to the nineteenth century. As a matter of fact, Mr. Burdett's essays are captivating and full of charm. They are of high literary value and deal not only with such literary subjects as Nathaniel Hawthorne, Meredith, John Gay, and the poems of Alice Meynell, but with such others as "The Passion Play," the personality of an old Don like Oscar Browning and the art of Charlie Chaplin. Mr. Burdett, in short, is an engaging essayist. His paper on "Shelley as a Dramatist," is, to this reviewer, one of the most illuminating comments on the author of "The Cenci," and his pages on "The Writings of Frank Harris" form probably the best brief comment on that curious author who seems like a character in a Spanish romance of a bygone age.

But how engaging soever, these are scattered observations, with no single thread or purpose binding them, with no such vision of an epoch as that which makes Mr. Muir's book stand out. Perhaps, indeed, comparison is irrelevant, if not impertinent. Their grouping together is only a sort of librarian's device. For Mr. Burdett has points of his own. For instance, he is an authority on Coventry Patmore, and his brief paper on the mystical poems of Patmore's daughter, Emily, a nun, deserves longer space and general knowledge. And his essay upon Thomas Love Peacock is the best brief review of that writer one is likely to meet with. Yet, somehow in comparison with these essays, those of Muir have all the depth and austerity of valication.

parted by circumstances quite beyond their control. Several stories have to do with murder or with death by violence, and one is a tale of horror and of happenings that cannot be explained by reference to any known laws of nature. Some of the plots are distinctly original and ingenious, while others are, in their essential features, trite, but even in these last the author has been able to give an appearance of freshness to the ancient devices to which all writers of fiction must occasionally resort.

The most ingenious story of the lot is perhaps the one entitled "A Matter of Voice," where a beautiful but utterly unprincipled woman evolves a perfectly fiendish plan for getting rid of her husband so that she may marry his rival. The one man who knows the truth about what happened has no evidence that would be considered in a court of law, and the guilty persons go unpunished. Very reprehensible, it is true, but it makes a good story.

AN ARSENIC MURDER

EVERY one who reads the daily paper has surely felt at one time or another very much as did the unknown woman whose phrase strikes the keynote of Mrs. Belloc Lowndes's new story of mystery and murder. She was coming out of the courtroom when she expressed her longing to know "What Really Happened," in the much-discussed Swanmere murder case and it is that knowledge the book gives us.

Eva Raydon was a young war-widow with a comfortable annuity from her dead husband's father when she met and fell in love with Birtley Raydon, who was himself very well off. He was not the only man by very many who had wanted to marry the charming Eva. Prominent among her other suitors was Jack Mintlaw, a Canadian with a splendid war record, poor when she first knew him, but who later, and after her second marriage, had a stroke of luck that turned him into a millionaire. Adelaide Strain, the plain, intelligent woman, herself a war-widow with a little boy, with whom Eva had lived before her second marriage, favored Jack Mintlaw and had no liking for Birtley Raydon. But Eva preferred Birtley and after they were married and settled at the Mill House Adelaide Strain came to live with them as their "lady-housekeeper," the charming Eva having no talent for domesticity. To all outward seeming the household was like any number of other well-to-do, comfortable and fairly peaceful establishments, so when Birtley Raydon was taken suddenly ill one night and died after a few hours of intense suffering not even the doctor suspected for a moment that he had been murdered. Only one person was not satisfied with the reason assigned for his death. That person was his mother. And it was the investigation quietly made by the elder Mrs. Raydon and the evidence she found which enabled her to insist upon the autopsy which revealed the fact that Birtley Raydon had died not from the perforation of a duodenal ulcer, as the doctor had supposed, but from a dose of arsenic.

There is a detective in the story, but he counts for comparatively little, partly because this is one of those rare mystery stories which do not depend solely on a mystery for their hold upon the reader's interest. We learn who killed Birtley Raydon about midway in the book, but that does not in the least lessen the suspense, principally because the characters are all of them real, flesh-and-blood people.

SHRIEKS IN THE NIGHT

JIG-SAW. By Eden Phillpotts. 265 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.

NOT the least interesting page of Eden Phillpotts's latest volume, "Jig-Saw," is the first. On it the publishers record to date the literary output of this versatile and highly industrious writer. Omitting plays, verse and essays, we discover "Jig-Saw" to be the twenty-seventh of Mr. Phillpotts's published novels. Yet despite this personal five-foot shelf to his credit, one finds that he has embarked on this latest story with the verve, the freshness and the enthusiasm of a newcomer in the field.

One may account for this partly because Mr. Phillpotts in "Jig-Saw" goes deliberately off his beaten track. He turns his back on his beloved Devonshire and Cornwall. He forgets, momentarily let us hope, his real genius for pastoral comedy and decides to work in the profitable pastures of detective fiction.

With a sure appreciation of the correct psychology, the author sticks closely to the approved pattern. True, his story contains plenty of novelty, but all such variations occur in the minor details. The main track, jig-sawish though it be, runs in the safe and sure footprints of Sherlock Holmes. But to the Conan Doyle formula, Mr. Phillpotts adds a new twist. For "confidante" he picks no mute, inglorious Dr. Watson, but an up and coming fellow-detective. The leading character in "Jig-Saw" comes to many of Mr. Phillpotts's readers as something of an old friend. He is none other than John Ringrose, the super-sleuth of that highly popular thriller, "A Voice From the Dark."

And the novelty? Well, Mr. Phillpotts has journeyed for it far afield into the mountains of Central Africa. Though the events of his story occur in London or in the vicinity of the metropolis, he imports strange devilries from the witch doctors of the Chaggas on the tablelands of Mount Kilimanjaro. Then he makes of the character of the arch-criminal concerned a highly unusual figure. In his psychologic make-up the lion and the lamb would seem nightly to lie down together. But lest the old-timer among detective story readers may have now begun to falter, let us on to the crime.

Not content with one honest-to goodness murder, Mr. Phillpotts sees to it that no less than three corpses deck the opening chapters. And the lose none of their thrill-inspiring qualities as one finds each of them a link to the solution of a mystery that unravels as the story's supreme novelty—a hideous crime based on motives of purest altruism! Further than that into the plot this reviewer will not go. Mr. Phillpotts with his practiced hand has devised the jig saw. It is for him to put the pieces of his puzzle together in his own good time and in his own good manner and in his own good time. That manner the reader will find sufficiently enthralling, and the time, with slight exception, sufficiently accelerated.

AN EDINBURGH URCHIN

THE BLUE BONNET. By Augustus Muir. 322 pp. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.

EDINBURGH street urchins must be an unco' canny lot, judging them by Hector McGraw, youthful hero of Augustus Muir's latest Scotch story, "The Blue Bonnet." For here is a wee eight-year-old laddie who has the acumen and the reasoning powers of a boy twice his age; nay, in some instances, of a grown man. Hector is never mistaken in his insight into human psychology; always divining hidden motives correctly and always able to turn an emergency to good account; using it to extricate himself from any danger that confronts him.

Mr. Muir confesses to the ambition of wanting to create a Scotch Huckleberry Finn. He had not quite pulled it off. But he has drawn a friendly and amusing little chap, even though the reader is constantly fretted by the fact that such maturity of mind dwells in such an immature body.

The jacket calls Hector a "Scotch Penrod." He is never that. Booth Tarkington's immortal creation always acts like a real boy. He sometimes stumbles blindly into an unexpected, happy solution of a dilemma; but he always gives one the illusion of common-or-garden youth.

With Hector nothing is left to chance. He is a Machiavelli and a Sherlock Holmes rolled into one, and he never misses his effects or stages a failure. Only a super-child could be as omniscient as this illiterate waif of the Edinburgh slums. He is too perfect. For where breathes the boy who has never gone down to defeat or known the miscarriage of a carefully hatched plan? Hector would have been more convincingly human had he muffed it now and again, instead of being an invariably triumphant hero.

The book consists of a series of episodes woven into a whole; each of which, however, forms a complete story by itself. There is the opening

Changing Life Of the Farm

Two Interesting Studies in Rural Sociology and Psychology

THE EXPANSION OF RURAL LIFE: The Social Psychology of Rural Development. By James Mickel Williams, Ph. D. 344 pp. New York: Alfred Knopf.

THE URBAN COMMUNITY: Selected Papers From the Proceedings of the American Sociological Society, 1926. Edited by Ernest W. Burgess. 261 pp. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.

By NICHOLAS ROOSEVELT.

PROFESSOR JAMES MICKEL WILLIAMS, whose volume "Our Rural Heritage" showed an astonishing insight into the psychology of the early American farmers, has in "The Expansion of Rural Life" carried his analysis of rural attitudes through the period of profound change that has taken place in the last forty years as a result of the breaking down of the farmer's former isolation by the automobile, the telephone, the radio and moving pictures.

The subject is most difficult to deal with simply, as it involves an infinitude of subtle perceptions of group and individual changes of attitude, as well as a thorough examination of the economic developments which have played such an enormous part in shaping the social and psychological changes. Other sociologists have made thorough studies of farm prices and of the relation of farmers to middlemen. They have described the growth of the cooperative movement among farmers and its influence on the prosperity of farmers. Although Dr. Williams deals with these matters exceptionally well, his great contribtion lies in his penetrating insight into the factors that have changed men's minds.

Whoever knows the recent history of America realizes that a half century ago the farmer was still an intensely individualistic man, living largely unto himself and his family, and subsisting by the labor of his and their hands. He was usually isolated and his intellectual attitude was narrow. Much dependent upon the vagaries of the weather, he was inclined to be fatalistic and religious. He believed in hard work and plenty of it. Self-restraint and self-control were the great virtues. He distrusted outsiders and "city folks." He neither knew nor cared much about the world outside his own bailiwick.

Today the farmer is tending toward cooperative enterprise. He is seeking the aid of science. He is looking toward earning more than a bare living and wishes to enjoy the comforts of the world. He is no longer isolated. He is no longer intolerantly and aggressively independent. At the same time, however, religion has lost much of its hold. The old attitudes toward relentless toil and self-restraint have largely broken down. The young people have defied parental authority. Discipline in the family, as well as in the school, is loose. Contacts with the outside world have increased the discontent of the younger generation. The farmer's attitude toward outside affairs and toward politics, while showing greater interest, shows a greater disrespect for politicians and Government.

What is back of these changes and whither will they lead us? These two questions are indirectly answered throughout the three hundred pages of "The Expansion of Rural Life." Here and there, as was the case in "Our Rural Heritage," the professor shows that he has a sense of humor as well as a keen wit. There are sentences which illuminate in a few words new lines of thought in connection with understanding our rural heritage, that show the author to be possessed of a philosophical as well as a sociological mind. So, for example, he attributes to the weakening of parental authority the cry for laws to protect weak people. To the loosening of the hold of religion, with its strong emphasis on personal integrity, he attributes the appeals to the State to enforce honor in business dealings, and significantly adds that "often there is not enough sentiment of honor to enforce the laws." He suggests that the growing willingness of the farmers to accept curtailments of their personal liberty by the Government is due to the fact that they have become more and more removed from their original distrust of Government, which originated in their relation to the tyrannies of Europe.

He even goes so far as to point out that in regions of Europe where choral singing is common, as in parts of Germany and Scandinavia, there is a greater spirit of cooperation than elsewhere, and suggests that the encouragement of choral singing in our schools may help to stimulate the working together and thus complete the breaking down of the old individual isolation of the farmers. His description of the reason why so many visionary rural leaders have failed to accomplish anything applies appositely to the attitude of many reformers elsewhere. "They could tell just what ought to be done," he says, "but were unable to do anything effectively, and so eventually assumed the rôle of critics of the organizations that did develop."

To give a summary of the material in this book is impossible in the short space of a review. Under the general heading of "The Period of Maladjustment and Individualism" he describes the changing economic conditions in the last quarter of the nineteenth century and their effect on attitudes toward work, religion, education, morality, pleasure and politics. Under the heading of "The Period of Readjustment and Cooperation" he traces the development of the cooperative movement as a weapon of the farmers against exploitation by middlemen and to further their own economic advancement so that they might enjoy more of the comforts of life. He describes the activities of the Grange and the Dairymen's League, and analyzes the changes in family, religious, educational and political attitudes that accompanied the greater financial independence and expansion of the farmers. The last chapters are devoted to the significance of these changing attitudes and of the possible future of the cooperative movement. Incidentally, he implies that in so far as rural New York is concerned there is little danger of the continued depletion of the farms. In fact, there is every reason to believe that farming will become increasingly important and stable as an industry. He reminds us that a circle described around Syracuse as a centre with a radius of 500 miles includes an area having a present population of fifty millions, of whom four-fifths live in villages, towns or cities.

The farmers of New York are, therefore, close to the largest urban population of any similar area on the Western Hemisphere. This strategic position is bound eventually to result in rising prices of agricultural products, in rising farm values and more intensive cultivation.

Professor Williams's book is a great contribution to the subject of rural sociology and psychology. Whoever wants better to understand American history or politics should read it and its predecessor, "Our Rural Heritage." Both are based on original research into actual conditions, as well as on an extensive study of books and monographs by specialists.

Of interest also to students of sociology and politics is the volume "The Urban Community," edited by Ernest W. Burgess. It contains papers from the proceedings of the American Sociological Society for 1925, dealing with such phases of urban life as American city birth rates, the growth of certain classes in the city, the problem of personality in the urban environment, community participation in city and regional planning, the effect of immigration upon the increase of population and other similar subjects. To persons concerned with city planning this volume will be particularly valuable. The contributions are mostly by specialists.

American History in a Hop, Skip and Jump

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE: A History. By Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker. 471 pp. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

WRITING one volume about the United States which will develop more than cursory interest on the part of mature readers, and labeling it "history" is easy enough. For instance, the pack of novelists may be turned on the scent in full cry. But if history be interpreted to mean what sound scholars with a definite sense of responsibility think it means, the undertaking of telling the whole story of the country in a single volume presents great difficulties.

This is not to say that historians are the chosen inhabitants of an awful circle from which they have a right to warn away intruders, but merely that there is some difference between a hawk and a handsaw. A one-volume history is usually read as a key book, and undoubtedly by a large proportion of persons not thoroughly versed in the subject to whom brevity is one of the main attractions. All the more important then, is it that the authors of the mass of such books shall do something more than exploit a "slant" or engage in a frontal assault on the rules of evidence.

The fascination of attempting to tell in compact form the main facts of American history, richer now than ever before because of large accumulations resulting from the World War and industrial development, is undeniable. Can the perspective, where there is so much need of selection and compression, be accurate? Is it possible to deal within such cramped limits with the more conspicuous periods of national evolution without pitiful inadequacy? Can the drama of American history—and there is much of it—be saved from the wreck? These questions arise to plague the well-equipped and well-balanced author of history at the moment when such a project flits through his mind.

Yet in recent years bold spirits have not been lacking who were willing to stake hard-won reputations on the hazard of the task. Dr. William MacDonald, formerly Professor of American History in Brown University, showed in his "Three Centuries of American Democracy," published a few years ago, that it was possible to sketch the development of all the important American institutions on an even scale in one volume and to diffuse the atmosphere of progressive scholarship throughout. Last year Dr. Robert Granville Caldwell, professor of the same subject in the Rice Institute, produced a volume in which, besides the main part of his narrative, he introduced the element of the emotional impulses of the people at different stages of their progress.

Dr. Wertenbaker, Edwards Professor of American History at Princeton, is the latest to enter the inviting field. Unawed by the inherent difficulties, he has enlarged them by seeking to bring out in his book the romance and adventure of American history while adhering to his purpose of presenting an outline of a complete narrative.

That such romance and adventure exist in ample measure cannot be doubted, and it is equally evident that this aspect of the story has been neglected too much. Tabloid romance might seem at first glance to be the only kind which could be introduced in a one-volume history, but Professor Wertenbaker has contrived to boil down his story to such proportions in other respects that he has been able to find space for an encouraging fulfillment of his hopes.

He has accomplished this in part by introducing the principle of the motion picture in his work, flashing on his screen from time to time the "high lights" duly emphasized, with much material not only on personalities but on backgrounds. Thus he devotes three pages of his precious space allotment to Braddock's defeat, a page and a half to George Rogers Clark's expedition, two pages to Pinckney's rebuff to Talleyrand and nearly three pages to the Dred Scott decision, besides ample picturing of such recent events as the elder J. P. Morgan's interview with Roosevelt in the White House and the Paris Peace Conference. An instance may be given:

> Mr. Morgan went to Washington to discuss the matter [the Northern Securities merger] with the President and Mr. Knox. An interesting trio they were: Mr. Roosevelt, courteous, urbane, forceful, his thick-set figure, iron mouth, small eyes gazing out fixedly from behind glasses, broad forehead, ruddy cheeks, giving the impression of radiant energy and vitality; Mr. Morgan, the personification of restrained power, with large frame, massive head, heavy jaws and drooping mustaches; Attorney General Knox, an exceptionally small man, but standing erect with chest expanded, solid shoulders, a Napoleon head, broad and deep, with high forehead, bulging crown almost denuded of hair, smooth-shaven face without wrinkles, drooping eyelids, prominent nose, lips thin and tightly compressed.

Then follows an account in which Morgan is represented as "in bad humor" and Roosevelt as adamant in his decision to push the Government's suit to break up the merger. One can readily visualize, as in a movie, the struggle of personalities.

Professor Wertenbaker's studies in Colonial history, the fruits of which have been published in books which have won for him his spurs as a productive historian, are in evidence in his treatment of that theme. He devotes two pages to the Bacon rebellion, which, for all that some historians of the Colonial period tell the reader, might be construed to have been an outbreak in the Chicago stock yards. The gush which is too often in evidence even in conservative histories in chapters on the development of popular institutions in the Colonies is missing. The author is in accord with the prevailing desire to depict the early American Colonists as men who ought to be recognized as men and not as stuffed images on pedestals.

Perhaps the strongest aspect of the book is its freedom from deadening parochialism. Its weakest feature, as is to be expected, lies in the incompleteness of references, due to the compressed character of the text. Thus there is barely a clause about the voyage of John Cabot to America, without an explanation of what the voyage was, and the Battle of North Point is not mentioned in the account of Ross's expedition in 1814.

It would appear, too, that Dr. Wertenbaker gives currency to views concerning the Indians which are becoming obsolete. In a Parkmanesque introduction to his first chapter he calls them savages, though recent investigations have shown, in the opinion of many of the foremost ethnologists, that in government, industries and even in some arts certain of the Indian groups attained a degree of development well beyond that of the barbarian conquerors of Rome.

The author's style, in the main, adheres closely to the current standard for historical writing. It is clear, rhetorical or forced in any way. He appears to be infatuated with the story he has to tell, and he succeeds in conveying this intensity of interest in no small degree to the reader.

Books and Authors

THE Dial's annual award of $2,000 for distinguished services to American letters is made this year to William Carlos Williams, the author of a number of books of verse and prose, his first group of poems, "The Tempera," having been published by Elkin Matthews in London in 1913. Dr. Williams, who is a practicing physician of Rutherford, N. J., was an early contributor to Poetry, the Chicago magazine of verse, and also to the London Egoist, and was joint editor with Alfred Kreymborg of the Magazine Others. The Dial award differs from most other literary prizes in that it is not competed for. It is given annually to one who has already accomplished a service to literature, yet has not completed his work. The aim of the donors is to give the recipient leisure and opportunity to go on with his work. Previous recipients of this award have been Sherwood Anderson, T. S. Eliot, Van Wyck Brooks, Marianne Moore and E. E. Cummings.

In January, Dodd, Mead & Co. will bring out a new edition of Agatha Christie's first novel, "The Mysterious Affair at Styles." This novel was written on a wager, the conditions being that the author should produce a mystery story which should completely deceive the person with whom the wager was made and that nothing should be held back. In other words, all clues which, in the story, lead to the solution of the mystery were to be at the disposal of the reader. After winning this wager, Mrs. Christie, who is American by birth but married to an Englishman, continued to write mystery stories with great success. At the time of her recent mysterious disappearance she was engaged upon a new novel which her publishers hoped to bring out next Summer.

Hamlin Garland's daughter, Isabel, and her husband, Hardesty Johnson, who are giving joint recitals of poetry and song, have included in one of their programs a group of the ballads so often referred to in Mr. Garland's novels "A Son of the Middle Border" and "Trail-Makers of the Middle Border" (Macmillan Co.). Mrs. Johnson reads a selection from "Trail-Makers of the Middle Border," and Mr. Johnson, who is a pupil of Jean De Reszke, sings an old Scotch air, "Maggie Air Ye Sleeping?" and his own arrangements of "When You and I Were Young" and "The Pirate's Serenade." All these songs were current in the early '90s and were sung by the Garlands and the McClintocks when they came together on Sundays and holidays.

Among the Spring publications of the Houghton Mifflin Company will be "Trollope: A Commentary," by Michael Sadleir. Mr. Sadleir, formerly connected with Houghton Mifflin Company, and now associated with the London publishing house of Constable & Co., is the author of the two novels, "Obedience" and "Privilege." In his delineation of Trollope Mr. Sadleir endeavors not only to show the man but also to place him in his environment.

At the Literary Vespers, conducted by Edgar White Burrill at Aeolian Hall this afternoon at 5:45, the subject will be "The Greatest of These." Mr. Burrill will discuss Victor Hugo's masterpiece, "Les Miserables," together with Will Durant's "Story of Philosophy," Lewis Browne's "This Believing World," and Bruce Barton's "The Book Nobody Knows." The next Literary Vespers will be on Jan 9.

Count Ilya Tolstoy, son of the famous Russian novelist, is now in Hollywood supervising a motion picture production of "Resurrection." The Inspiration Pictures, Inc., have the film in hand. The American publishers, the Thomas Y. Crowell Company, are cooperating in the production and will probably issue a special edition of the novel when the film is released.

Edward A. Wilson, whose two books, "Iron Men and Wooden Ships" and "Full and Bye," show his ability as an illustrator, is now at work on the illustrations for a two-volume collection of the shorter tales of Joseph Conrad, to be published by Doubleday, Page & Co. Just which tales are to go into the book is not definitely decided, but among those which are sure to appear are "Typhoon" and "Heart of Darkness," both of which appeal strongly to Mr. Wilson's imagination.

Among the early Spring publications of the Macmillan Company will be "A Reporter for Lincoln," by Ida Tarbell. It is written in novel form, but the story "tells has a strong basis of fact. The "reporter" of the story is an old newspaper man of Lincoln's time who is still living.

Albert J. Nock, former editor of The Freeman, is expected back from Europe in a few weeks. He has been working on a new book to be published by Albert and Charles Boni. The title has not yet been announced.

"Ask Me Another," by Justin Spafford and Lucien Estey, to be published early in 1927 by the Viking Press, is a volume of information tests, by which the reader may gauge his knowledge or ignorance of the things he ought to know. Each of the lists has been tried out on one or more prominent persons, and the ratings obtained by these persons are given, so that the reader may know how he compares with people who have attained eminence in various fields.

The subject of Dr. J. G. Carter Troop's free lecture at the Hotel Majestic this afternoon at 3:30 will be "American Soundings," by J. St. Loe Strachey, published by D. Appleton & Co.

Thornton Niven Wilder, author of "The Cabala" and of the play "The Trumpet Shall Sound," scheduled for production this season at the Laboratory Theatre, is now in Italy writing a story of Peru to be called "The Bridge of San Luis Rey." It will be published late in the Spring by Albert and Charles Boni.

A few weeks ago we expressed a desire to learn the first name of the German author who signs himself "Klabund." Mr. G. Wolff of Binghamton, N. Y., informs us that the author's real name is Alfred J. Henschke. We can't blame the man for adopting a pseudonym. His real name sounds too much like the beginning of an attack of influenza.

Ethel M. Dell is represented on the Spring list of G. P. Putnam's Sons with two books, a novel, "The Black Knight," and a collection of short stories entitled "The House of Happiness."

A new and revised edition of A. Hyatt Verrill's "Panama Past and Present" is to be issued shortly by Dodd, Mead & Co. This edition contains so much new material that it has been decided to change the title to "Panama of Today."

Until Jan. 30, Major Joseph Wheless, author of "Is It God's Word?" (Alfred A. Knopf), will conduct Bible classes every Sunday morning at the West Side Unitarian Church, 550 Cathedral Parkway. As Major Wheless's book shows that he does not believe the Bible to be the product of Divine inspiration, it is needless to say that in conducting the classes he will deal with the Scriptures from a critical and rationalistic point of view.

Leo Perutz, the author of "From Nine to Nine," is to be represented again on the list of the Viking Press with "The Marquis of Bolibar," a novel dealing with an incident of the Napoleonic campaign in Spain. It is a story of mystery and adventure. The book is scheduled to appear early in February.

A new novel by Anne Douglas Sedgwick, author of "The Little French Girl," is promised by Houghton Mifflin Company for publication in March. The title is "The Old Countess," and the leading characters are the Countess herself, a gay, wicked, intriguing old woman; an English painter and his wife; and a young French girl over whose life hangs the shadow of a crime.

Among the earliest publications of E. P. Dutton & Co. in 1927 will be a new volume in their "Wisdom of the East" series on "Omar Khayyam, the Poet," by T. H. Weir, Lecturer in Arabic, Glasgow University. The same firm has recently brought out a handsome edition of the Fitzgerald version of the "Rubaiyat" with illustrations by Fish.

Donn Byrne's new novel of Biblical times, "Brother Saul," now running as a serial in the Pictorial Review, is to be published in book form by the Century Company some time during the coming Spring season.

Valentine Williams, who wrote "The Key Man," recently published by Houghton Mifflin Company, and other novels, is going to write his memoirs. His idea is that the proper time to write memoirs is before you are old enough to have become thoroughly disillusioned.

WHAT culture is and what it is not is discussed by Robert L. Duffus in The Bookman for December under the title, "An Outline of Culture." The quotation marks about the word "Culture" are placed there, as Mr. Duffus informs us in his first paragraph, to indicate that the chief subject-matter of his essay is not true culture but an imitation which bears the same relation to the real thing that a dickey does to a shirt. America, Mr. Duffus tells us, has always been avid for "culture." The lecture bureaus have catered to this appetite, and so have the Chautauqua circles, the study clubs and many widely advertised sets of books. Concerning one of these the author writes:

The most noteworthy of the early adventures in the culture industry was the exploitation of Dr. Eliot's five-foot shelf. The real value of this collection was undeniable, though it was always possible that what was the good doctor's meat would be a lesser man's poison. But Dr. Eliot's culture was handed out by his publishers as though it were a patent medicine. We were to massage a little gently into our scalps with a rotary motion every night before going to bed, and after a while even our best friends would have nothing that they shrank from telling us. Besides, we should be too busy telling things to them. Of course the whole notion was hopelessly barbaric. It was fetich worship, pure and simple. I am willing to venture the axiom that any one who thinks that he can become civilized by the reading of a set of books, no matter how thick and wide and tall they are, hasn't the faintest glimmering of an idea as to what civilization is. For Dr. Eliot it was a luminous and lovely way of life. But for thousands who read his five-foot shelf it could have been no better than an incantation. They could more profitably have spent their time looking at the stars, or at grass on a windswept hill, or at waves on a driftwood beach. For there is a culture in these things, a culture in hammering houses together, a culture in running locomotives, a culture in knowing where the schools of mackerel are headed and how the wind will blow for twelve hours to come, a culture, even, in curing a Ford car of a fit of hiccoughs. Culture is an insight into the heart of life, which one may experience half way up a cliff or half way down a mine or quarter way through Plato's "Republic," but nearly always when one is not looking for it.

The trouble is, as Mr. Duffus points out, that what many people want is not so much culture as the appearance of culture, just as the men who wore dickeys, in the day when such things were worn, did so for the purpose of making people believe that they were wearing shirts. But the person who acquires imitation "culture" often ends by deceiving himself, and that is something that never happened to the wearer of a dickey.

Judge Charles C. Nott Jr. makes some rather startling statements in his article, "Old Adam," in the December Scribner's Magazine. The nature of some of these statements may be inferred from his subtitle, "The Criminal Is Natural Man," and his thesis is further amplified in the following paragraph:

These two instincts, viz., to get whatever one wants and to resent all injuries or opposition, are natural and fundamental and, indeed, without them there could hardly be civilization and liberty. But when they are exercised with no regard to the rights of others they become dangerous, and mankind gradually came to realize that, tempting as it might be to seize whatever one wished, or to slay any one whom one hated, yet in the long run each individual would lose rather than gain by this simple and natural process, and therefore the undue exercise of these fundamental instincts was prohibited under the names of crimes against property and crimes of violence. The instincts, however, were entirely natural and the restraint of them was entirely artificial. But the restraint has now been in effect for so many generations and become so much a matter of course that we sometimes regard it as the natural thing and the manifestations that it restrains as the unnatural and abnormal. Consequently in the last few years a cult has grown and flourished, along with many other sentimentalized fads, which announces that crime is abnormal and that any man who commits a crime thereby demonstrates that he is and must be mentally abnormal, and is therefore a subject for the psychiatrist (or at least the psychologist) and the asylum or sanitarium rather than for the police, the courts and the penal institution.

Judge Nott has no sympathy with the view that crime is a symptom of abnormality. He insists that the percentage of mental defectives is no higher among criminals than among non-criminals, and he quotes the tests made upon the members of the American Expeditionary Force during the war in support of his claim. He finds, moreover, that the moron class is increasing at an alarming rate, and he attributes this increase not, as might be expected, to our vices, but to those achievements upon which modern civilization most prides itself. Here is the argument:

Owing to the progress that modern medicine and surgery have made, aided by philanthropy and scientific hygiene, in nullifying the great natural law of the survival of the fittest, the unfit are surviving and multiplying at an ever-increasing rate. The moron class is gaining so in numbers on the general population that it is a simple arithmetical problem to calculate how many years it will take at the present rate of gain before everybody in this country is a moron. When that time arrives government of, by and for the people will have ceased and we shall have become a moronocracy.

That sounds reasonable enough, but there must be a catch in it somewhere. Otherwise our only salvation lies in a return to savagery so that the law of the survival of the fittest may get in its work before it is everlastingly too late.

The Minaret, a magazine of verse, has ceased publication. The editor, Herbert Gerhard Bruncken, has given out a statement in which he says:

There comes a time when the pursuit of an ideal must either be suspended or permanently abandoned. The Minaret has been such an ideal. It has weathered through a considerable number of crises, suspended publication on one occasion, was revived again and has, with the exception of this one suspension, been published continuously since it was founded by the present editor in 1915.

The time has come for it to cease. Whatever service it has rendered to American poetry cannot be measured by any statistical record. The editor can only believe that its existence has been the means of encouraging many promising poets to greater efforts toward the perfection of their art.

In 1915 there was a genuine need for magazines chiefly interested in poetry. Today the need is by no means so great, as can be seen by the amount of space devoted to good poetry in the large journals throughout the country.

The Minaret ceases publication, therefore, primarily because the circumstances which inspired its inception have disappeared.

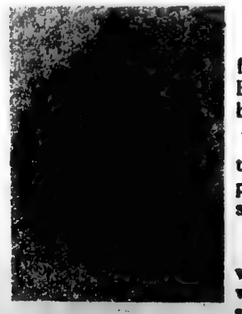
IN QUEST OF THE PERFECT BOOK

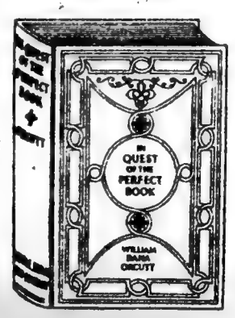
Reminiscences and Reflections of a Bookman

By WILLIAM DANA ORCUTT



Mr. Orcutt, combining an expert knowledge of typography with a facile pen, tells of his search for perfection in bookmaking. The quest led him abroad,—to the old monasteries and libraries of Europe, where he studied the triumphs of typography from Gutenberg to Cobden-Sanderson, and beautiful illuminated books from the early Byzantine to the sixteenth-century Italian.

The reader accompanies the author as an intimate friend throughout this pilgrimage, is permitted to meet interesting people when off parade, and to become acquainted with the fascinations the book possesses as the product of an art. Unusual personal anecdotes and appealing romance enliven the scholarly account of Mr. Orcutt's experiences during his quest for the perfect book.



"This volume will undoubtedly make its widest appeal as a 'book about books.' It is written with all the zest of inspiration. With a style as intimately personal as that of A. Edward Newton, and an equally confidential frankness designed to bring reader and author together, another potent influence has entered the book-loving circle."—George Parker Winship in the Christian Science Monitor.

"A book that will charm the reader and lead him into new adventures. Mr. Orcutt, printer and author, gives us double measure in this handsome, distinguished volume." — David Pottinger, President of the Society of Printers, in the Boston Herald.

"A beautiful example of the art of bookmaking. Beautiful to look upon, to touch and to read."—W. Orton Tewson, in the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

With a frontispiece in color and 85 remarkable illustrations, many reproduced from old and rare books and manuscripts. Third large printing. $5.00

"LET US TAX THE VOTE SLACKER"

Senator Capper Believes He Should Be Penalized for Failure to Cast His Ballot and Proposes to Levy an Impost Upon Him Whenever He Neglects to Go to the Polls on Election Day

By SENATOR ARTHUR CAPPER of Kansas

IN the year 1705 the Colony of Virginia compelled by law every citizen failing to vote to forfeit 200 pounds of tobacco to the person reporting his negligence. In the year of our Lord 1926 the political bosses of the more or less sovereign State of Pennsylvania decreed that virtually any citizen who was reluctant to vote might be enrolled as a "watcher at the polls" at a stipend of $6 if that would induce him to vote—assuming, of course, that the said watcher would "vote right."

Such is the progress of democracy and civilization in the course of 221 years!

"How many people do you suppose would vote if we didn't pull 'em out?" a Pennsylvania political subloss asked me while we were discussing the disclosures resulting from the Senate sub-committee investigation of the Vare - Pinchot - Pepper race. He answered his own question in these words:

"About one man or woman in five takes any interest in the average election aside from those whose pocketbooks are directly or indirectly affected. The policemen and firemen, the fellows who work at the City Hall, in the Court House or in the Federal Building, are sure to vote because their jobs depend on the result of the election, and they'll see to it that their families, personal friends, next-door neighbors and relatives down to the last sister's brother-in-law all vote and vote right, too. But outside of these people and the ones who have city and State contracts there are few persons who will walk three blocks on a rainy day to cast a ballot, even if the election is for President of the United States. Why, some of 'em are so lazy and indifferent they won't even walk across the street from their own homes to vote. I know a man who lived right next door to a voting booth for eight years and never voted once all that time.

"The only way we can get some of them to vote is to go for them in automobiles, especially the women folk, and a lot of others we just simply have to hire as election helpers or watchers to make them take any interest. Don't blame the politicians—blame the people, Senator."

Nevertheless, I do "blame the politicians" for resorting to such methods to get out the vote. But instead of merely "flaying" or "probing" the bosses I propose to circumvent them by having the Federal Government itself buy the votes and make the people pay the bill. And the Government will pay a higher price than the Pennsylvania scale!

The plan I have in mind will be offered as an amendment to the tax-revision bill when it reaches the Senate in this session of Congress. Briefly, it provides that citizens of the United States who are legally qualified to vote shall pay an additional tax of 1 per cent. of their gross yearly incomes after 1927 unless it can be shown they have voted in the last preceding election of President, Congressmen or United States Senators or were prevented from doing so by unavoidable absence from their homes, by sickness or by some serious disability. The first payment of this vote slackers' tax would be due in 1929.

A Pied Piper—Piping a New Tune.

There is nothing visionary or impracticable about the plan. It embodies the same principle—that of "compulsory voting"—that has been found extremely and lastingly effective in other countries. Enactment of my proposed amendment will have this effect: The man or woman who negligently fails to vote in the national election of 1928 will have to pay the Federal tax collector $10 for every thousand dollars of his or her annual income in addition to whatever other income tax may be imposed by law at that time. But the way to avoid the tax will be simple, namely, by going to the polls on election day and casting a ballot. A ballot cast by mail will also exempt the citizen from the special Vote Slackers' Income Tax.

The plan put into effect will either bring about a record-breaking vote in 1928 or an immense increase in the amount available to pay off the national debt. Later it may be found feasible and advisable specifically to set aside the proceeds of the vote slacker tax for educational purposes or for publication of campaign literature, but, in my opinion, the tax would not yield a great amount of revenue; its principal result will be millions of "new" voters.

It is said "there is no right without its duty," and certainly under our form of government there is no higher duty than voting. Ask the average citizen who does not vote what he thinks should be done to the bank director who does not attend meetings or keep an eye on the bank officials, thereby permitting them to mismanage and wreck the institution, with consequent loss to the depositors, and said citizen will probably say: "That kind of bank director ought to be hung." The same citizen does not realize, however, that when he fails to vote he is neglecting a duty even more important than that of the bank director.

The average citizen does not realize, of course, the extent of his financial interest in the Federal Government. Representative Fletcher of Ohio has pointed out that the three and a half billions of dollars spent in the course of a single year by the United States Government would fill 94,000 one-ton trucks with silver dollars, and if these were lined up in single file, 142 trucks to the mile, there would be a procession 662 miles long. Mr. Average Citizen would trudge at least ten miles to see such a parade, but he will consistently refrain from walking even a block to vote in an election deciding how that money shall be spent and who shall spend it.

Going back into the history of public indifference and apathy toward elections, we find that in Chicago in 1887 less than 72,000 out of a possible 138,000 votes were cast. For Judges the same year less than one-third of the qualified voters cast ballots. The vote in New York State in 1880 was 300,000 less than the year before, with the result that Governor Hill advocated a fair trial of "compulsory voting." But apparently the only State that has given serious thought to the idea so far is Massachusetts, which in 1918 adopted an amendment to its Constitution giving the Legislature authority to compel voting.

Public indifference to elections, and therefore to good government, has been steadily increasing. Recently President Coolidge directed attention to the steady decline in the vote in the five Presidential elections between 1880 and 1896. Yet, he pointed out, the average during that period was 80 per cent. of those entitled to vote, contrasted with an average of less that 50 per cent. in 1920 and 1924.

To make clearer the actual condition, let me emphasize that 27,000,000 people voted for one or the other of the Presidential candidates in 1920, and at least 28,000,000 others who could have voted did not. In the Senatorial elections in 1922 the actual vote in most States was considerably less than 50 per cent. of the possible vote. Many of the successful candidates received as little as 7, 9 or 10 per cent. of the total eligible vote. In some of the States only one-third of the eligibles voted; two-thirds stayed at home, went fishing, or otherwise occupied themselves, undisturbed by thoughts of the election.

How does this compare with other countries where the people have the right of suffrage? Not so well. In England, for instance, during the same period, 82 per cent. of the possible vote was cast. German citizens cast from 75 to 82 per cent. of the possible vote. Italy had a voting batting average of 90 per cent., or considerably more than "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

It is evident that in the United States, where government of the people by the people and for the people was first tried on a large scale, we have been growing more and more indifferent to the right of self-government for which our forefathers bled and died in the Revolutionary War. This, too, although we sacrificed thousands of our finest young men in the World War "to make the world safe for democracy."

Incidentally, the highest vote cast at a Presidential election after 1900, compared with the possible vote, was in 1916, when Woodrow Wilson was a candidate for re-election under the slogan, "He kept us out of war!" The votes cast that year were approximately 70 per cent. of the number that might have (Continued on Page 23)

SANTA CLAUS VISITS WHITE HOUSE DAILY

American People Play the Role and Their Gifts to the President Range From Live Animals to Prime Roasts

By CARROL C. HATHAWAY

To the President of the United States every day is a little bit of Christmas, and the way in which his Dec. 25 differs from other occasions is merely in the greater number of gifts received. For all through the year presents come rolling in. Like humanity in general, most Americans have a half-unconscious feeling that if they can but touch the hem of the garment of some great individual, they are winning for themselves some little share in his greatness. To have driven over a country road where George Washington once drove, to have stood where Lincoln spoke, to have slept in a bed where General Grant slept, are honors that most of our fellow-citizens instinctively prize. And to have sent a turkey or a jack-rabbit or a pumpkin or a cane to the head of the nation reacts with a sense of exaltation upon the donor.

Many of the gifts to the President of the United States are animals. A King of Spain sent George Washington a jackass. Out at the Washington Zoo still lives a faded old Somaliland ostrich which King Menelek of Abyssinia sent to President Roosevelt. Near by is a cinnamon bear captured in Mexico and sent to President Coolidge. Another Coolidge gift was a pet wallaby, which turned out to be nothing more dangerous than a kangaroo from an American in Tasmania.

Abraham Lincoln was once presented with a huge white ox, said to have been the largest in the country. He gave it away and later the animal, which was named "General Grant," was placed on exhibition on Pennsylvania Avenue while the famous General was being inaugurated.

The Harding régime was the golden age of Airedales, but the Coolidge Administration specializes in collies and cats. One pussy was so important that when he went off on a midnight prowl his description was broadcast by radio. The cat came back, but he never learned to appreciate his historic atmosphere. Friends in Tennessee forwarded a lively wildcat, saying with dry Southern humor that he would make a good playmate.

Christmas and Thanksgiving bring turkeys innumerable. The President could never begin to eat all of the gobblers sent, and some go to the employes of the White House. The President has even received a live wild turkey from Montana. A Vermont girl adopted a unique way of assuring herself that her gift did not go astray. She raised a turkey, brought it to Washington, cooked it and served it personally to the President and Mrs. Coolidge.

Americans with prize steers often forward pieces of the choicest cuts to the President, urging him to sample the meat and tell them about it. When President Coolidge attended a live-stock show in Chicago he was followed back to the capital by a prime roast from one of the prize winners.

Up in Massachusetts there was a small church supported by a fruitful area known as "God's cranberry bog." Fabulous prices were paid by people from all over the country for the product. But President Coolidge was presented with enough cranberries from "God's cranberry bog" to add zest to his Thanksgiving dinner. Again something else that must have particularly appealed to his New England appetite was enough maple sugar for an old-fashioned sugaring-off party, which was brought him by 200 Vermonters.

Once some one mentioned that President Coolidge liked apples and apparently every one in the United States who raised them sent in their best samples, until the number was almost beyond belief. Enthusiastic donors have been known even to send quantities of peanuts and greens to the White House.

Perhaps the most famous tidbit ever received by any President was the huge cheese weighing 1,400 pounds presented to President Jackson by a New Yorker named Meecham. Jackson kept it a whole year to ripen and then held a cheese party on Washington's Birthday, 1837, to which all Washington was invited. On the morning of the big day a committee of New York friends presented Jackson with a phaeton made from timbers of the famous frigate "Constitution." In accepting the gift, Jackson told his admirers: "The broken ribs of the renowned vessel which once bore our gallant tars to victory are now destined to bear the wreck of an old soldier to his repose."

Ostriches and cheese! And wearing apparel! Quantities of knitted and crocheted articles are constantly arriving at the White House, some of the specimens evidently requiring months to make. Hand-made lace is received from Southern European countries, accompanied by notes saying that the writers need the money and "Will the President please sell the lace" for them?

Most of the gifts that roll into the White House are addressed to the President, but some of them come direct to Mrs. Coolidge, such as a 200-pound box of candy prepared by an association of candy manufacturers. Needless to say, Mrs. Coolidge could not begin to eat all of it and one of the children's hospitals of Washington disposed of it to an appreciative clientele.

Some Italian women of Boston sent the First Lady a white wool dress, a group of Hungarian women in Ohio presented a centrepiece, and the Camp Fire Girls gave her a ceremonial robe bearing the emblems of a ship, a pine tree, an iceberg and the sun.

Occasionally the gifts may be very valuable, but costly tokens to the head of the nation are discouraged as they convey a sense of obligation. Down in the jewel room of the National Museum in Washington in a beautiful string of pearls, worth many thousands of dollars, presented to Martin Van Buren in 1840 by the Imam of Muscat, Arabia.

Cinnamon bears and pearls come to the White House simply because the ruler of a great country resides there. In some cases, the motive behind the gift is mercenary, such as possible advertising for a commodity. In other instances the donor wishes to secure publicity for some product of the State where he resides. But in many other cases the motive of direct personal esteem for the man or woman dwelling in the Executive Mansion elicits gifts which are part and parcel of the Christmas spirit, no matter in what part of the year they come.

In Roosevelt's day, the executive office was filled with many "big sticks," some with butts as large as pumpkins. As a matter of fact, innumerable canes are received, including a variety with the President's likeness carved for a handle. Gavels are also favorite gifts. Coolidge received one made from the wood of Abraham Lincoln's Springfield home, and another from a cherry tree on the estate where George Washington was born.

One gift for the President nearly missed its destination. When Frank A. Munsey died in 1925, there was found among his effects a sheet of White House stationery with the mystic figures "7¼." The administrator of the estate was puzzled, but finally learned that Mr. Coolidge wore a hat of that size and that Mr. Munsey had promised him one of a special kind, which was ultimately delivered.

A number of Americans with antique furniture have tried to give it to the President, spurred on by a Congressional resolution permitting the acceptance of such gifts. Few such offers have been found acceptable, for the mansion is also considerably cluttered with presentation household effects from past generations.

The President is offered honorary degrees from most of the leading colleges and universities, and some not so leading. These are frequently conditioned on his attendance at commencement exercises. He is also, often without his consent, made an honorary member of more or less obscure societies. Another unique gift is a new name, usually bestowed by some visiting Indian delegation. A group of Sioux Indians gave Mr. Coolidge the questionable honor of the name of "Rear Ribs," while the Camp Fire Girls have named the First Lady "Aikahyi," meaning "best friend of all."

Mr. Coolidge is not much of a sportsman, but this did not deter a welterweight champion giving him a pair of boxing gloves, which he advised him to use on Congress. Of more practical benefit is a present which comes to him every Spring—one which would make a small boy green with envy—a season pass to all of the professional baseball games held in the capital, with Walter Johnson as the leading attraction.

Books and pictures, of course, come by the score. It seems that every book written about Abraham Lincoln is sent to the President to read, and whenever a writer publishes a book in which Mr. Coolidge is even casually mentioned he is sure to receive a copy.

Christmas is only one of the holidays that bring White House remembrances. Last Easter President and Mrs. Coolidge received some rare turquoise-colored eggs, valued at $100 a dozen, laid by Araucana hens, queer birds said to be natives of Chile. On May Day children bring flowers to Mrs. Coolidge's front door. In 1925 signs were posted in the Washington stores reminding the public that July 4 was the President's birthday and saying, "Send him a birthday card." His mail was equally heavy.

While it is possible for any mere private citizen to give the President a gift, the Constitution prohibits his accepting one from a foreign State without the consent of Congress. When President Wilson visited Europe he faced an embarrassing situation, for every one wanted to give him presents of one kind or another—honorary degrees, books, pictures, bronze figures. Mr. Wilson was compelled to refer the matter to Congress.

Another recent President bumped against State legislation when he visited a Western Commonwealth where the sale or gift of cigarettes was prohibited. Unaware of the law when he accepted a gift of this kind, he was severely criticised for his unconscious infraction of the law.

"LET US PUT A TAX ON THE VOTE-SLACKER"

been cast. Four years later the vote slumped to 49 per cent. Another four years later, in the 1924 Presidential election, with Coolidge, Davis and La Follette in the ring, and thousands of organizations making the greatest effort to bring out the voters, 29,000,000 of them, or 51 per cent., responded. But 28,000,000 remained "asleep at the switch," to use inelegant but fairly descriptive language.

The State of Pennsylvania in the year 1924 registered 1,850,000 votes for Coolidge, Davis, La Follette, et al., while approximately 2,500,000 of its citizens who could have voted failed to. In other words, for every 100 citizens in Pennsylvania who voted there were 133 who stayed at home. Evidently there was not much demand for "watchers" at $6 per that year. The same tendency is noticeable this year. The seven principal cities of Ohio registered 250,000 fewer voters than two years ago, although population has increased.

Failure to vote might not constitute a serious menace were it not that citizens who should be best informed to vote intelligently, and best circumstanced to vote unselfishly, are the very ones who abstain from voting. The gang wards in any large city always cast the highest percentage of votes. It is in the sections where the middle class and wealthy live that votes are scarcest. In Philadelphia several years ago an investigation disclosed that on a high-class residential street only 28 per cent. of the people had voted, while in a slum district 71 per cent. of the possible vote had been cast—and virtually all for a "slate," for one set of candidates. Bad weather keeps the so-called intelligent citizen away from the polls, but has no noticeable effect on voters in the boss-ridden wards of our larger cities.

Compulsion's Record

Wherever a plan of compulsory voting has been tried it has brought gratifying increases in the number of citizens participating in elections. Belgium, as far back as 1893, imposed fines for failure to vote, with very satisfactory results in increasing the number of ballots cast. Some of the Swiss cantons (equivalent to our States) have similar laws. In these cantons an average 78 per cent. of the possible maximum vote is cast, compared with only 40 per cent. in other cantons not having such laws.

Australia has a stringent compulsory-voting law, imposing fines of from $2.50 to $10 for failure of the qualified citizen either to vote in an election or in a referendum, or to keep his name on the registration list. He must constantly keep the election officials notified of his place of residence, if he moves about.

In one sub-division of Australia (Queensland) the law increased the vote from 52 to 82 per cent. At the 1925 general election in Australia there were 3,015,000 votes cast out of a possible 3,200,000. In the six States of the Commonwealth of Australia the vote was from 88.7 per cent. to 92.9 per cent. of the possible total, or an average of 91 per cent. While in 1922, before the law went into effect, only 57.9 per cent. of those entitled to vote actually did.

"I don't know a solitary thing about half, or even a fourth, of the candidates who are running," is the plausible excuse offered by many a man or woman when urged to vote.

The excuse is a valid one within certain limits. In the 1926 election the former voters in one Western State—my own, by the way—had the duty of casting a ballot for thirty-three political offices, ranging from United States Senator and Governor to justice of the peace and township constable. City dwellers had even more offices to fill. The voter, unless he cast a straight party ticket, had to decide which of two men he probably had never seen and perhaps never heard of before was best qualified for State Auditor, for instance—not even knowing the exact duties of that office. He was also required, by his conscience at least, to decide which of two candidates, probably unknown to him, would be the best State Printer; who would constitute the best township clerk, and which of several more or less well-known lawyers would best ornament the Supreme Court bench. And there were at least thirty other offices calling for similar decisions.

Without doubt, the frequency of elections and the horde of candidates for a large number of minor offices are prime causes of vote-slackerism. But public apathy toward our Government has grown to such an alarming extent that a drastic remedy is required. Just as the imposition of unjust taxes gave impetus to the birth of our nation, it is likely that Mr. Average Citizen, compelled to vote or to pay an additional tax of 1 per cent. of his total yearly income, will suddenly realize he is an integral part of the Government and must do his duty at the ballot box. Not only will he vote, but he probably will insist upon a shorter ballot, and less frequent elections. And when the politicians know there will be a full vote they will have to discuss real issues, not mere vote-getting ones; they will have to drop personalities and discuss principles. Less money will be required to "bring out the vote," and there will be less need to solicit or to accept corrupting cash donations from those seeking unjust advantages. These would be great steps toward clean, honest and more intelligent elections.

Because of constitutional limitations, we cannot impose a direct penalty by way of fines for failure to vote in national elections. But the bill I propose does offer a substantial, and a perfectly legal, inducement for the exercise of the freeman's right of franchise. There is no copyright on the plan, and the forty-eight States are perfectly welcome to use it. When it costs a citizen from $10 to $100 or more to stay at home on election day, he will not have to be, and cannot possibly be, hired by any candidate as a "poll watcher" at a paltry stipend of $6. Political corruption will lose its strongest ally, public indifference, when 80 per cent. or more of the eligible voters actually vote.

KING ALBERT'S ART COLONY

work at its new task. On Aug. 12, 1921, its President had called for a competition among Italian architects, outlining in the conditions of the competition the program which the academy had in mind for the island. Six residences for working artists were to be provided, a small pavilion for exhibition of art, a small hotel for visitors, an office for the administration of the island and a site for a statue of Signor Caprani were to be planned, all of them in architectural harmony with the old Church of San Giovanni which stands at one end of the island. Only part of it was to be built upon. Most of it was to remain green and terraced. The possibilities of further archaeological work on its two sites were to be kept in mind. Its two little landing places for boats would necessarily play a part in the laying out of its roads and groups of buildings. Only working artists of Italian, Belgian and other allied nationalities were to be eligible for its six residences.

As the result of the competition, Gaetano Moretti of Milan, the foremost of modern Italian architects, was chosen for the work. He is known everywhere in Italy, but his principal work outside of Italy has been the Uruguyan Parliament House at Montevideo where a street has been named for him. The total cost of the work is estimated at 5,000,000 lire (say $200,000) and the Brera hopes to raise it all in Milan but its success is still uncertain.

The Belgian and Italian Governments are at present waiting on the Brera's campaign. The Belgian Government has no State funds on which it can draw, but King Albert's expressed hope for the success of the Brera's campaign has resulted in the collection of a number of paintings by Belgian artists which will if necessary be offered for sale, the proceeds to go to the Brera. The Italian Government is also willing to assist if necessary, but the two Governments have agreed through the usual diplomatic channels to await definite word from the Brera before taking further steps. There the matter stands at present.

From the short road, the island appears as a crescent-shaped ridge with high sides thickly shaded with trees, a small cottage of white-washed stone crowning the ridge at the near end, the stubby pink tower of the whitewashed church of San Giovanni lifting above the tree tops at the far end. From a point in the road nearest to it (it is not more than seventy-five yards offshore) a boatman was prevailed upon to make the crossing to the old stone stairway at the landing.

Since the island is private property and nobody is permitted to land on it without permission, it is deserted for ten months of the year, but for two months it is occupied by the President of the Milan Artists' Society. By knocking at the closed door of a cottage, the boatman succeeded in rousing Remo Sasso from his siesta. Unshaven, collarless, coatless and with blotches of yellow paint on his trousers, Signor Sasso dived back into the cottage to add a linen duster and a screw monocle to his other attire and set out to show his visitors the island.

On San Giovanni's feast day, the last Sunday in June, the island is crowded with thousands of peasants from the mainland villages, but for the rest of the year the church is locked and its not very interesting interior can only be surveyed through the barred windows in the porch. The castle, the walls, the college of Santa Eufemia and the monastery of Acquafredda are gone. The present church was built in one end of the ruined basilica of Santa Eufemia and fishing nets were drying over the excavated altar end. Cut grass was drying on the overgrown terraces and sometimes a few goats are pastured on the island. But all the terraces, the stone paths along the narrow summit of the ridge, the stone stairways up its steep sides and the two stone landings, one at each end of the island, are slippery with [illegible] grass.

Except for San [illegible]ni's feast day and the two months of the year when the whitewashed cottage is occupied, the once busy island has been left for centuries to the sunshine and the lizards. For the first time since the fifteenth century it is again to be occupied and its new occupants are to be artists.

AN OLD WASHINGTON RIDDLE IS SOLVED AT LAST

William Augustine Washington was entertaining a company of his friends. Large fires were made in the cookhouse to prepare food for the guests, and it is believed that sparks flew among some cotton seed that was spread out to dry on the loft of the ell of the house.

"The bricks used in building the house at Wakefield were not imported, as generally stated, but were made in the brickyard at Wakefield. I lived with my father until I was 35 years old and heard these and many other family matters of interest from his lips. From my personal knowledge my father was a man of remarkably clear and retentive memory. These facts were prepared by my father and I believe them to be accurate, as he never made any statement of which he was not sure. I believe, therefore, that his statement covering Wakefield can be fully accepted."

George Washington himself described his birthplace as a "mansion"; in a letter to Sir Isaac Heard he referred to Wakefield as "the ancient mansion seat." General Washington was 49 years old when Wakefield burned.

All this represents reliable testimony. The Father of his Country was accustomed to mansions. He knew as well as we today know the difference between a mansion and a humble farmhouse. So it is certain he used the term advisedly. Nor can the testimony of William Lanier Washington be dismissed.

Wakefield Remnants

In 1892, before the ground on which Wakefield stood had been cleared for the granite monument, erected back in the '90s, that now marks the site, M. D. Conway, in a book called "Barons of the Potomac and Rappahannock," observed: "In describing the house as a small one, popular writers have followed each other like a flock of sheep; but even a flock of sheep grazing over the débris might discover, at least to an observing eye, that it was a large mansion. A little digging reveals massive brick foundations and all the features of the ground indicate a noble residence. There are remains of a large brick-walled dairy built underground."

The site was more or less dug up at the time the monument was put in place, since, owing to the great weight of the granite shaft, it was necessary to ascertain the character of the soil. Last Summer delvers sent by the Secretary of War, in whose hands the matter of building the present national shrine rests, have been again at work. They were reported the other day as having unearthed some interesting discoveries—bits of china and glass, entombed at the time of the fire that destroyed Wakefield on Christmas Day, 1780. Well-defined remnants of the old foundation walls of the house were uncovered. These foundations, of red brick, show the house to have been of irregular outline and considerable size.

But even had the cellar excavations indicated a small house, Mr. Hoppin asserts that no estimate could be formed, based on such evidence, as to the size of the house itself, since it was the custom in building Southern houses to excavate only part of the ground on which the house was reared. There would be a big wine cellar and perhaps, as was the case at Wakefield, an underground dairy. But large sections of the house rested directly upon the ground, with no cellar beneath.

The house, Mr. Hoppin informs us, was not a brick house. The foundations were of brick, and there were huge chimneys; but it was a frame structure—similar, in that respect at least, to Mount Vernon. Mr. Hoppin helps to simplify the present highly complicated issue by explaining that three houses figured conspicuously in Washington's early life. First there was the house at Wakefield, in which he was born, and with which the "Lossing picture cottage" has been long confused.

Next there was Mount Vernon. When George was a baby the Washingtons moved from Wakefield to a house on a tract containing 2,500 acres, including the present site of Mount Vernon, on the Potomac. According to some accounts the family moved not to Mount Vernon but to the cottage pictured by Chapman in Lossing's book. Mr. Hoppin, by exhaustively consulting parish and county records, has found this to be untrue. Mount Vernon, then, was the second residence of George Washington.

Later on Augustine Washington, George's father, purchased the Strother property, comprising 280 acres. This farm was in the neighborhood of a 400-acre farm on the Rappahannock, known as "Little Falls," which Augustine's wife, Mary (Ball) Washington, had inherited from her father. "Little Falls" was about two miles below Fredericksburg. Further downstream several miles was the Ball homestead farm, called "Traveler's Rest." It is thought that Augustine Washington acquired the Strother estate so that his wife might reside nearer her friends, in a spot less isolated than was Mount Vernon in those days. The Strother house was, like Wakefield, a "mansion"; for another inventory of household goods shows that it contained some ten beds "with accompanying accessories."

These were the three homes of George Washington during his childhood and youth. Not one of them, it seems, bore any resemblance to the little cottage advanced by B. J. Lossing as being the same as George Washington's birthplace.

Another assertion upsetting to popular supposition is that the so-called "Ferry Farm," on which Mary Washington lived "after her son George sold the Strother place and removed to Fairfax County in 1748," was not the scene of George's boyhood exploits. A year or two ago a movement was reported to be on foot to buy this "Ferry Farm" property as a memorial. According to Mr. Hoppin these lands played no part at all in George Washington's youth.

So myths are one by one dispelled. And although the issue is extremely confusing—owing partly, no doubt, to the fact that all these places lie within a relatively small territory—Mr. Hoppin's researches have thrown light on vital points.

It is proposed to complete the Washington Memorial and its beautiful surrounding park by 1932, when the 200th anniversary of George Washington's birth will be celebrated. But Mr. Hoppin, still pleading caution, observes:

Gunston Hall Model

"The outstanding question is: Who is the Virginian, familiar with ancient Virginian architecture of the homes of gentlemen, clever enough to design a house like the house in which Washington was born?" There is, indeed, little to go on—and that, in part, of a negative nature. It must be a mansion and not a simple farmer's dwelling. But mansions are many. Keeping that interminable inventory of household goods in mind, as well as the wealth of additional evidence in his possession, Mr. Hoppin says that "it must be a house of ten or twelve rooms, two stories high, with an ell." He suggests that it ought to resemble Gunston Hall, below Mount Vernon, on the Potomac.

Joseph Dillway Sawyer, author of a forthcoming book on George Washington, believes that a satisfactory counterpart of Wakefield is to be found in the so-called Bewdley house, formerly located on a farm not far from Lancaster, Va. This house, too, was destroyed by fire some years ago, but a drawing, he says, is available.

In all events, Mr. Hoppin urges, "better no structure at all than to build a replica of that utterly discredited and hopelessly inadequate Lossing picture cottage, so long put forth as representing Wakefield." And to this the association agrees.

A WESTERN CATTLE MAGNATE SITS IN THE SENATE

cows and calves and all thin and weak "stuff" are confined in the bottom meadows and fed hay every day. There also is a hospital bunch that is fed grain in addition to hay. At the same time the strong dry "stuff," steers and dry cows, are confined in good hill pastures where there is available protection from storms. These hill pastures may be many thousands of acres in extent, approximating something of the old range conditions, but they are all fenced.

Every few days in Winter the riders go through these pastures to select from the herd such cattle as need better care and attention, and remove them to the feeding grounds below. In hard seasons, with deep snow and crust, even the strong, dry "stuff" in hill pastures is fed hay. There is constant handling during the cold months, with the one object of saving the cattle rather than leaving them unattended to die.

Spring brings the branding time as of yore; but the old Spring round-up, covering hundreds of miles of the open range, is a thing of the romantic past. The cows and calves in the lower meadows are turned out into other pastures, and any new calves that are large enough are branded before they are turned out. Later there is a small round-up to brand the late calves.

Dehorning, vaccinating for blackleg, dipping for lice and scab, moving the cattle about for one purpose or another, take up the time of the Spring and early Summer. Always, too, there is horse breaking and fence repairing. Then comes haying time, one of the busiest and most important times in the annual cycle of the modern ranch.

In the Fall comes the big beef round-up, with something of the old-time spirit in it; but the cattle are under better control because of the fenced range. With Fall branding, dipping and vaccination done, and with fence repairing that never ends, the annual cycle is brought around to the Winter stage again.

The proof of Senator Kendrick's faith in the cattle industry, as a remunerative business and a builder of character, is his anxiety to have his son follow the trail that he has made.

Manville Kendrick, now 26 years old, with experience on the ranch combined with a Harvard education, is preparing himself to take up the business when his father drops it. And Manville's sister, Miss Rosa-Maye Kendrick, when not assisting her mother as hostess of the Kendrick mansion in Sheridan or the Senatorial home in Washington, D. C., rides a cow pony or shoots a six-gun as well as he.

John B. Kendrick has done well by the West, and the West has done well by him. Though a Democrat in a normally Republican State, politics does not enter into his scheme of public service, nor into the minds of those who have elected him to public office over a period of sixteen years.

In 1916, when Governor of Wyoming, he was nominated for United States Senator at the primaries, although he was not a candidate and his name did not appear upon the ballot. It was written in by the voters, and afterward he was elected over his Republican opponent. Six years later he was re-elected by a large majority.

That is what the people of Wyoming think of John B. Kendrick, cattleman and Senator. But they think far more of him as a working, thinking citizen of the West—what they call a man.

GERMAN CHEVALIERS OF HONOR LEGION

WHAT is to be done about the German Chevaliers of the Legion of Honor who received their decorations before the World War? The question is being debated in the council of that order. The problem was stated by Gabriel Boissy, seconded by M. Antoine and discussed at length by Clement Vautel, G. de la Fouchardière, Pierre Mille and Paul Souday. Among the suggestions was this, framed by Charles Omessa:

"Let those Germans who were admitted to our order before the war and who wish to be restored to it ask formally, in writing, for such restoration. That will bring the matter before us properly, and we can then investigate, consider and decide whether we can, without indiscretion and without humiliation, permit this reentrance into a community of honor so completely disrupted by war."

ARCHITECTURE OF AMERICA MOLDS BEAUTY ANEW

Ralph Adams Cram Says Native Genius Has Made Most Original Contribution to This Art in 400 Years

By VIRGINIA POPE

WITHIN a half century the architects of the New World have fairly leaped into the front rank of their art, and in their work they are expressing an American ideal in architecture that is one of the growing glories of the present era. And it is flowering in four fields simultaneously—commercial; domestic, ecclesiastic and collegiate.

"One is tempted to exclaim, 'Miraculous!'" said Ralph Adams Cram, reviewing the phenomenon. "For in architectural achievement, America is actually heading the world!"

High praise from a high authority and a severe critic. Mr. Cram is himself one of the foremost architects of the United States, whose name is associated with beautiful buildings throughout the country, and whose enduring fame will probably rest with the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, now under his supervision.

His admiration for what his fellow-craftmen have accomplished in the comparatively short span of fifty years is based on profound as well as practical knowledge. While, in his opinion, Americans have surpassed their European teachers in the four categories mentioned — commercial, domestic, ecclesiastic and collegiate—it is in commercial architecture that they are pre-eminent, and, furthermore, it is the first important and original contribution made to the world in this art in four hundred years.

"In an extraordinary way, the forward march of architecture and our material expansion have been synchronized," said Mr. Cram. "What we have done in steel and stone can assuredly be said to be the expression of the best in us, and may, perhaps, be a prophecy of the great things that are yet to come. Architecture in this country has surpassed the civilization and culture of which it is an outgrowth—it is immeasurably better than we have a right to expect it to be. In the church spires and the soaring silhouettes of the buildings that compose our skyline there is a profound spiritual quality."

Pausing in his praise of American accomplishment, Mr. Cram surveyed briefly what has been taking place in other lands. France has gone steadily backward in every branch of architecture since the time of Napoleon III. A real sense of the Gothic was lost after the day of François Premier, at which time its spirit and tradition were closely intermingled with the beauty of the Renaissance; with its passing the ability to create good ecclesiastical architecture died. While the French did not live up to their glorious past, the art of designing good buildings was not wholly lost, as is proved by the invalides, with its splendid dome, founded by Louis XVI, though the Pantheon, begun almost a hundred years later, shows the consequent fall. Nothing of unusual value in the commercial field was done since the Second Empire. In the construction of dwelling places, country houses, cottages and apartments, Mr. Cram feels that there has been a distinct retrogression during the past century.

England, on the other hand, received for a time a tremendous impetus from the flaming spirit of Pugin the elder, who, strange to say, was a Frenchman and a refugee from the Revolution. According to Mr. Cram, he carried the best of Gothic traditions across the Channel with him, leaving nothing behind. This able man initiated a movement in England which, until the present century, swept that country forward in a splendid surge of productivity, particularly in the ecclesiastical field, and which was later to bear fruit in America. He inspired a dozen or more men who did marvelous things, but their span of activity was all too short. American disciples like Upjohn, Renwick, Congdon and Haight nursed the flame of the torch he lighted and brought it across the Atlantic, implanting the seed of Gothic architecture on American shores.

Some of the pupils of England's brilliant group are continuing in the path opened by their masters; notable among them is Sir Giles Scott, designer of Liverpool's cathedral, one of the noblest works of modern times. In the building of homes, both town and country, England has always excelled, never failing to keep alive her old traditions of domesticity.

Victorianism, it is true, cast a blight upon domestic construction, but it did not last long. Ruskin put new life into the good work begun by Pugin and reawakened the old love of substantial truth and beauty. Once again England was inspired. The last quarter of a century witnessed a generous outpouring of genius, still evident in the country houses so delightfully executed in stone, with mullioned windows and reflecting the best of the sixteenth century.

In commercial architecture there is a striking difference between the two English-speaking countries. Great Britain believes in being magnificently monumental, while in America there is efficiency combined with beauty, cleverly executed. True to form, English architects cling to solid, powerful masses, with little surrender to the new principles of steel and concrete.

Turning his attention briefly to Italy and Spain, Mr. Cram commented upon their modern architectural achievements as being negligible, wild and fantastic, in their frantic outbursts reaching one of two extremes; either they fall under the heading of art nouveau, or they revert to a dry-as-dust classicism.

Germany before the World War had started to work out something that promised to be of great value. Governed by a thoroughly Teutonic spirit, it had elements of originality and was at the same time rational and structural. Whether or not the cataclysm of war destroyed this movement only time can tell.

Outside of the United States the most stirring and vital architectural expressions are to be found in the Scandinavian countries, Mr. Cram asserted. In Denmark, Norway, Finland and particularly in Sweden architecture has sufficiently linked itself with tradition and at the same time has preserved a sense of fitness and beauty.

America's supreme gift to architecture is in the type of commercial structure evolved largely as the result of economic needs.

"Nothing," said Mr. Cram, "has been so original since the Renaissance. We have done what England has not done, and what the Scandinavian countries are trying to do; we have recognized new structural devices as the determining factors of design and architectural style. The dawn of this new era was ushered in when we began to use steel and concrete as structural elements. Many were the experiments made in the perfecting of the steel frame style, but it was not until Cass Gilbert designed the Woolworth Tower that the first great stroke of genius was manifested.

Opened the Way

"His daring venture opened the way for the spirit of the new age, and yet he was not independent of the past for his detail; he turned to medieval times for his ornamentation. Since then, however, others have realized that it is not logical to use Gothic motives on so modern a marvel as a skyscraper."

Here Mr. Cram called attention to the change that is taking place, for architects are turning from the classic and are substituting something that is more truly American. To illustrate, he mentioned the Shelton Hotel in New York, which has "attained the most logical expression of function and material reached up to the present, and which in so doing has lost nothing of its esthetic value.

"Fortunately for the skyline and the general appearance of city streets," Mr. Cram added, "overgrown suggestion has made necessary the ordinance that insists upon 'setbacks,' banishing the uninteresting slab wall

EUROPE LINKS THE WORLD BY AIR LINES

Pioneer Aviation Days Are Over and Great Flying Companies Prepare to Encircle the Globe in Ten Days—New British Airplane Balances Itself—More Great Dirigibles Are Being Built

Big Multi-Engined Air Expresses Drawn Up for Inspection Outside the Sheds at the London Air Port.

America, the home of the airplane, has lagged behind Europe in the development of commercial aviation. Here passenger travel and the carriage of freight by air line are novelties; in Europe they are commonplaces. What Europe is doing in this new field of transportation is therefore of keen interest to all Americans. With the pioneer days virtually over, the great air navigation companies of Europe are preparing to establish routes that will encircle the world. The coming phase of globe-girdling flight is forecast in the accompanying article. The writer has served as technical secretary of the British Aerial Transport Committee.

By HARRY HARPER

LONDON.

THE phase of experiment is ending, and practical development has now begun. Such, in a word, summarizes the position reached, after seven and a half years of pioneer flying, by commercial aviation in Europe. The groping stages of trial and error are over. With improved airplanes and organization, and vast accumulated experience, the air companies of Britain, France and Germany are busy with plans to add 12,000 miles to the 18,000 miles of existing European air routes, and to pave the way for those great interconnected routes, by airship, airplane and flying-boat, by which travelers will make swift journeys completely round the world.

Britain, in conjunction with India, Australia and the Dutch East Indies, is working actively upon the scheme for a high-speed airway from London to Melbourne, a distance of 12,000 miles; and the extent of the progress now being made can be judged from the fact that it is hoped, in the quite immediate future, to have nearly 4,000 miles of this trunk line in actual operation. In January Imperial Airways, the national British company, opens for regular traffic the first commercial empire air line between Cairo and Karachi.

By employing this 2,500-mile air link, travelers will save a week on a through England-to-India journey. And the opening of this line is to be a prelude to the forging of other essential links. The improved tone of European relations enables Imperial Airways to move rapidly with its plan for a fast airplane line from London to Cairo, linking up there with the route to Karachi. This 2,400-mile air express will fly probably via Cologne, Prague, Budapest, Bucharest and Constantinople. Further eastward, beyond Karachi, extension schemes come within the purview of the Indian Government; while at the Australian end some 1,000 miles of the line between Port Darwin and Melbourne are already functioning.

The Australian authorities are energetic also in their plans to push out a 1,200-mile line from Port Darwin to Sourabaya, joining here with a route to Singapore, Rangoon and Calcutta, there to establish contact with the airway through to London.

Sir Alan Cobham's 28,000-mile flight to Australia and back has focused British attention upon the need for empire air lines. Business men, knowing how the development of empire trade has in the past depended upon sea transit, are beginning to realize that in the coming era of keener competition the airway will be a vital factor in exploiting new sources of mineral and other wealth.

Cobham's Argument

The chiefs of big undertakings have been impressed by Sir Alan Cobham's argument that pioneer air lines, bringing new lifeblood to remote regions, should be developed irrespective of whether they immediately begin to pay. He contends that such air lines should be regarded from the same viewpoint as pioneer railways. They cannot tap profitable traffic immediately, because, from the day they begin to operate, they are in the process of creating traffic which did not previously exist. Thus, even if they do not earn dividends at once, they are providing facilities which enable other undertakings to expand in a manner which would be impossible without air transport, with ability to pass unimpeded above mountains, forests and trackless deserts.

This is the pioneering view of aerial transport which is now being realized in Europe. It is the theory animating the German Lufthansa Company in the scheme now being prosecuted for a 5,500-mile air line through from London to Peking. Already, in addition to more than forty internal German air lines, the metal Lufthansa monoplanes operate a daily route from London to Berlin; and here, each night, the service connects with airplanes, equipped with sleeping-berths, which fly through the darkness to Königsberg. Another air link carries the traveler to Moscow, the journey from London being accomplished in thirty-three and a half hours.

From Moscow the scheme now is to go on stage by stage eastward to Peking; and these further sections have already been surveyed by air experts of the Lufthansa Company. The next step will be the commercial organization of the line, in cooperation with the Russian Soviet and Chinese authorities. When equipment is provided for night as well as day flying it will mean that a passenger entering a multimotored plane at the London air station will fly right through to Peking in not more than about three and a half days, as compared with eighteen days by earth transport.

It is expected that this great trunk line eastward will, as soon as it is running, have an immense influence upon the development of trade, it being proposed that small passenger planes and goods craft should act as "feeders" to the main route, bringing in traffic from outlying districts.

The progress of today in European air transport may be realized by going back in one's mind to the year 1919, when a small biplane initiated the world's first daily airplane express by flying from Hounslow, near London, to Le Bourget, on the outskirts of Paris. Since then approximately 100,000 passengers have been air-borne in and out of London's air port, while the total mileage of the air expresses flying to and from London has been nearly 10,000,000. Today, by a network of air lines, passengers ascending from London in the morning can before nightfall that same day reach Copenhagen, Zurich, or Marseilles.

The first plane on the daily service to Paris was a converted warcraft, driven by a 360 horsepower motor, and carrying a pilot and two passengers—the latter packed almost like sardines in a tiny cabin, and having to endure such a din from the engine roaring away in front of them that conversation was impossible except by shouting, and messages scribbled in pencil had to be passed from hand to hand.

By contrasting that first air express with one of the latest machines on the London-Paris service, the Argosy of Imperial Airways, one obtains an impression of the technical strides which seven and a half years have brought about. Carrying twenty passengers, and weighing just eight tons, the Argosy is driven by three engines developing a total of approximately 1,200 horsepower, and these motors are so far silenced that conversation can be carried on while in flight with only a slight raising of the voice.

Lofty Saloon

The saloon of this big plane is roomy, lofty, spacious. For the passenger there is a soft-cushioned armchair seat. On one side there is a curtained outlook window, which may be opened as desired. On the other is a central, carpeted gangway. Racks are provided for coats, hats and light articles of luggage. At the rear of the saloon, which is scientifically heated and ventilated, is a completely equipped toilet compartment. Mounted on the front wall are instruments telling height and speed. And the passenger, having provided himself before starting with one of the airway luncheon baskets, may enjoy an aerial meal while speeding thousands of feet high.

The stage now reached with the three-engine system practically eliminates any risk of a compulsory descent while in flight between terminal stations. Take the Argosy, for example. Even when it is carrying a full load, and should any one of its three motors stop dead, this big machine has such a reserve of power in the other two engines that it continues in normal flight and reaches its scheduled destination. And the chances of more than one engine giving serious trouble at the same moment is so remote that this three-engine installation does, in everyday work, confer a virtual immunity from forced landing. A similar security is gained with the German three-motored Junkers' planes; while with a cornice stuck on top of it, so frequently in use before."

ARCHITECTURE OF AMERICA

With the mammoth office buildings Mr. Cram classifies the proportionately large apartment houses, in which there are not one but many palaces, each of which is as individual as if it were a separate house. "Of them it can only be said that they are the normal outcome of our mode of living. I consider Park Avenue a marvelous spectacle."

"Our public buildings," continued Mr. Cram," starting with Bulfinch's State House on the Boston Common, and including that most amazing one at Harrisburg, have a style all their own. The most revolutionary one—the one that has freed itself entirely from the rank and file is the Nebraska Capitol, designed by Bertram G. Goodhue. It is one of the great original pieces of architecture in America."

Public architecture is, in his opinion, rising to a high standard. More and more, our old habits of utilizing the archæological is being abandoned and American inventiveness is stepping in to take its place.

Only casual allusion to some of the good things done by American architects during the past twenty-five years is necessary. Vital and creative are the Masonic Temple of the Scottish Rite in Washington and that admirable library in Indianapolis, initiated by Paul Cret and worked out by Zantzinger, Borie and Medary. Henry Bacon's Lincoln monument in Washington is a masterful achievement, and particularly fine are the Boston Library and the Rhode Island State Capitol, of McKim, Mead & White, forerunners of many other structures, of which the New York Public Library of Carrère & Hastings and the Minnesota Capitol are the most notable.

The growing discrimination of American taste is everywhere in evidence, and the fact that good architecture is the fashion is even more noticeable. "Hotels, no matter how sumptuous, reveal refinement of conception," Mr. Cram said, "and our railway stations are august monuments. What could be more complete than the Grand Central Terminal, what more imposing than the Pennsylvania Station?" Nor does Mr. Cram overlook the shop fronts and the ingenuity shown in them. He calls them "delicate and scholarly essays in pure design."

No less astounding than the strides made in commercial architecture is the effulgence of the ecclesiastical. What has happened since 1900 was barely to be foreseen when, some twenty years before, Richardson was at work on the Brattle Square Church in Boston.

Toward the close of the last century a few men, to whom Mr. Cram picturesquely refers as crusaders, unconsciously laid the foundation for a development that was to go beyond their most ambitious dreams. They answered England's message, and Vaughn, who was her architectural ambassador to this country, taught them the language in which they were to speak when he built the chapels at St. Paul's and Groton. These were the beginnings of the Gothic revivification that was later to grip the country, making possible such glorious contributions to our art as the chapel at West Point, St. Thomas's Church on Fifth Avenue, and the cathedrals of New York and Washington, which promise to hold their own with the best work produced in the Middle Ages.

"And what," asked Mr. Cram, 'could be more exquisite than the Carmelite convent at Santa Clara?"

Two Cathedrals

At present, two stately cathedrals are rising in calm majesty above the rush of our commercial existence. St. John the Divine is the second largest in the world, and promises to be one of the most distinguished examples of religious art. Magnificent is the Washington cathedral, begun by Vaughn and Bodley, who proposed to follow rigid lines of English fourteenth century Gothic, and now is being completed by Frohman, Robb and Little, with architects of the New York cathedral as consultants.

"Where are the men coming from whose lively brains are conceiving such beauty?" asked Mr. Cram. "Fifty years ago there were five of them; today there are fifty.

"Ecclesiastical architecture is in the air. Gothic made itself felt in other lines, especially in our rapidly growing colleges. So successful were Cope and Stewardson at Princeton that the idea spread to other institutions until Tudor or Collegiate Gothic became almost universally popular in men and women's colleges. Here again one is confronted with the difficulty of singling out any one or two groups to mention for their special merit. One of the most brilliant expositions of the Gothic is that contributed by Gamble Rogers in the Yale Quadrangle."

Turning to the last of the four categories in which America has surpassed other nations, Mr. Cram said it was difficult "to describe our domestic architecture, it is so beautiful, direct and straightforward."

In response to a question regarding the future of architecture in America, Mr. Cram said: "It depends entirely upon the line of development we follow. If Spengler is right and culture is the expression of the highest development of a people, while civilization is the evidence of decay, then we must see that our boasted civilization is curbed in its course, that the true 'culture' to which Spengler refers becomes our ideal, and that its everlasting values are made the object of our quest."

PRIZE MONEY FOR SEAMEN

Thousands of Pounds Credited to Missing British Sailors Have Never Been Claimed

LONDON.

ANOTHER of its intermittent reminders that "thousands of pounds" of naval prize money are waiting for missing seamen to turn up and claim their shares has just been sent out by the marine department of the Board of Trade, which is the father and mother of the British mercantile marine. How many thousands of pounds are still unclaimed and how many missing seamen are entitled to file claims the Board of Trade refuses to say. Perhaps it does not know itself, for its sole interest in the matter is to persuade missing claimants to turn up and take away their money. One by one they do turn up, but even now, eight years after the war ended, it is necessary to circularize British consulates at seaports throughout the world begging British seamen to ask for the money they won during the war.

The national Sailors' and Firemen's Union is helping in the search to locate these "dead" men of the sea, and there are no seamen's organizations anywhere with a wider reach than the Board of Trade and the Sailors' and Firemen's Union. The men for whom they are searching were mostly members of the Royal Naval Reserve during the war, serving in small craft and converted merchantmen. The record of each man is complete down to demobilization. Some held officers' commissions in the reserve; some were warrant officers; most of them were seamen—a few were boy ratings. What has happened to them?

Hundreds of seamen disappear every year, some never to be heard of again; some to turn up sooner or later with no explanation of their absence, either asked or offered. The world is wide and shore life is varied. Almost any British seaman has little vacancies somewhere in his Board of Trade discharge certificate. Somewhere amid the stamps, signatures and endorsements, the figures of tonnage, horse power and ships' numbers, which fill the greasy pages of one of these little blue-bound volumes is an entry to the effect that the holder shipped out of the port of London for the Straits, China and Japan, followed by the ominous entry: "Voyage not completed." In less official language, this frequently means that the holder went ashore and missed his ship.

Why seamen miss their ships in foreign ports is a question whose answer is necessarily various. Sometimes a man who misses his ship takes the next ship he can get. Sometimes he drops into a comfortable shore berth and never goes back to sea—in which case, as far as the Board of Trade and his union are concerned, he becomes another of the sea's "dead" men.

Meanwhile, if one of these men of the mercantile marine served in the Royal Naval Reserve during the war it is possible that he has money waiting for him at the Board of Trade. Every officer and man who served in a seagoing warship of any kind, from battleships down to armed boarding vessels, trawlers and drifters, is eligible to participate in the naval prize fund, which is shared out in the following proportions: Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Fleet, £1,000; Admiral Commanding in-Chief, £850; Vice Admiral commanding a squadron, £600; Rear Admiral commanding a squadron, £400; a senior Captain in command, £160; Captain's rank, £40; Commander's rank, £30; Lieutenant's rank, £20; warrant officer, £12; midshipmen and chief petty officers, £10; navy cadets and petty officers, £8; able seamen, £5; boys, £3.

As far as the recipients could be located the Admiralty long ago completed the distribution of the prize fund which accumulated during the war. For officers and men of the regular navy the share-out was easy but for the Naval Reserve it was more difficult. Most of the personnel of the reserve went back to the mercantile marine as soon as they were demobilized, and those whose addresses after demobilization were unknown had to be sought through the marine department of the Board of Trade. Some of them have not yet been found.

It may be added, however, that the Board of Trade is not in the habit of paying out money to everybody and anybody who asks for it. The money is there and the Board of Trade is anxious to have the right men come and take it away. But "dead" men of the sea who turn up to claim their shares are required to prove their identities before their claims are even considered.

FROHMAN'S STAGE MEMORIES

plays that are still memorable in the theatrical history of the last quarter of the nineteenth century. "The Prisoner of Zenda," which presented Sothern as the original Elphberg twins, set a whole fashion of bittersweet romantic drama.

It was Daniel Frohman who brought over the Kendals to play "Mrs. Tanqueray," when "Mrs. Tanqueray" was very shocking indeed. It was Daniel Frohman who presented "Trelawny of the Wells"—within the last two years revived by The Players. It was Daniel Frohman who brought to New York a whole series of other plays by Pinero and subsequently by Henry Arthur Jones and R. C. Carton.

At Daly's Theatre, beginning with the new century, he was the means of presenting to the American public a series of English musical comedies which middle-aged playgoers still remember for their cheerfulness and charm.

It was the period when such shows were apt to invite attention by using the word "girl" in the title—a word that has not yet, even with every woman in knee-length frocks, lost quite all its magic. There was, for instance, "The Runaway Girl" (revived), and after that came "The Country Girl" and "The School Girl," in which Edna May appeared. Another offering (in 1903) changed the bait a bit. "The Three Little Maids," it was called. And there was "San Toy," which reached back to "The Mikado" for its inspiration. None of these is really important, but it is just as well to remember that Daniel Frohman's theatres did not furnish an exclusive bill of romantic drama and society comedy.

Sitting now beside his desk in that big room, so full of memories, at his newer Lyceum Theatre (where David Belasco is the active play producer), Daniel Frohman is a picturesque figure in the preposterously tall collar of his proper period—a piece of social equipment he has never been able to discard for more informal neckwear. He is a man full of the kindness that goes so gracefully with rich experience. His conversation, if you can turn it that way, is a personal record of almost everybody worth while in the theatre in the last fifty years.

One of the things he will be almost sure to tell you is that he was the first American manager who went abroad to hunt up authors and plays for our stage. Upon his first expedition to London for this purpose, in 1870, he met the galaxy of celebrities who made the Garrick Club illustrious in those days, from Sir W. S. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan, to Sir Henry Irving—who was not yet dubbed a Knight. That was the beginning of international contacts that have included all the outstanding figures of the British theatre since.

SECURE AS THE BEDROCK OF NEW YORK

the French, going a step further, are experimenting with air expresses driven by four engines.

When we reach the stage of a passenger monoplane weighing about forty tons, it will not only be possible to put all the engines inside a huge hollow wing, about six feet thick, but also to provide facilities for mechanics to move to and fro inside the wing, attending to the running of the motors while in flight.

Apart from the perfection of aircraft, striking developments recently in European air transport are the improvement in methods of navigation and in wireless telephony between planes and ground stations. Recently, when British Dominion Premiers visited the London air station, they saw a large craft, now in experimental use, which to all intents and purposes flies itself. A gyroscopic device, developed by the Royal Aircraft establishment, can be switched on by the pilot, to relieve him on a long journey from the task of steering his machine. Once he has gained his required height, and has made an allowance for any leeway caused by winds, he brings this automatic control into play and the machine steers itself accurately on any given course.

A similar mechanism applies the principle of automatic control to the ailerons, or movable surfaces governing lateral balance. This enables the plane not only to be steered but also to be balanced automatically; and all that is left for the pilot to do is to control his height by means of the elevating planes, and to attend to the running of his engines.

German Experiments

This new phase of automatic control is important in view of the far larger commercial planes now in hand. German experts are busy upon the first stages in the construction of an aerial mammoth to be driven by twelve engines and to carry 100 passengers. With another all-metal giant plane, also of German origin, it is proposed to make experiments, early this next year, in the operation of across-Atlantic service; and in all such enormous craft the principle of automatic steering and balancing will be adopted, the control of the machine being in the hands of a navigator who will be responsible for the course which is set and adhered to, while a working crew will maintain the height required and attend to the mechanical equipment of such liners of the air.

Contributing largely to the regularity obtained by European airways is the admirable system of wireless communication, which plays a vital part in safety working. In misty or foggy weather the officials at the London airport are in ceaseless touch with machines in flight. A pilot who is uncertain of his position above the obscured face of the land below can call up Croydon and ascertain—after wireless bearings on his machine have been taken by Croydon and Pulham (Norfolk), working in conjunction—precisely the point above which he is flying as he rushes high through the air.

There is another aspect, too, of wireless telephony on the airways. The control office at Croydon, when visibility is bad, keeps a pilot informed of the positions of all other machines in flight on the route he is traversing; while in the case of a Channel crossing in misty weather Croydon will communicate with machines on this section, and instruct their pilots to maintain different heights, thus precluding any possibility of a collision in the air.

Then there is the system of meteorology which has been developed and improved as a result of years of patient effort. A special method has now been devised on the European air lines whereby half-hourly reports of weather conditions are sent by wireless from the big air stations, and hourly bulletins from those of lesser importance. The information contained in these special reports, and the weather position generally, are combined in maps which are available for pilots before they ascend; while during their flights the wireless telephone keeps them informed of what the weather is like ahead, and of any general atmospheric changes which may be in progress. One pilot may also call up another while machines are passing each other and ask him some specific question as to the weather on the section of the route over which he has just flown.

It is such perfections of technical detail and the confidence they inspire which are causing European air companies to operate new lines stretching from country to country. The International Air Traffic Association, representing the airway interests of all Europe, has just held an important conference in Berlin. It proposes the adoption of one uniform type of airway ticket. It also aims to facilitate the making of connections, when required, between airway and railway.

On one of the air services from London travelers fly through to Basle, and here change to a train which gets them to Milan that same night. In another case, on the main French route from London to Morocco, passengers fly to Paris in the evening, catch a sleeping-car train for Toulouse, and then fly on, next day, down the coast of Spain and across to Northern Africa, arriving at Casablanca the same evening.

Cooperation the Keynote

The keynote of European air progress now lies in cooperation of an international basis. In one country after another a series of separate companies have been merged into one national enterprise. This has taken place in Britain with Imperial Airways. It has occurred in France with the Air Union, and Germany has concentrated her efforts in the establishment of the powerful Luftthansa Company. What experts now predict, as a development of the not far distant future in one all-powerful international, is a fusion of national companies enterprise, operating aerial transport throughout all countries rather on the lines—as applied to railways—of the International Sleeping Car Company.

Flying knows no frontiers. To the pilot, Europe is represented not by different nations but merely by so many big air stations. London, Paris, Madrid, Rome—they are just ports of call upon distance-devouring airways; and there would be immense advantages to be gained in standardization of airplanes and organization by an operation of European air lines upon one combined plan. But, of course, this is not a question merely of commercial advantage. National prejudices have still to be considered; while always, somewhere in the background, is the menace of aerial war. It may be a long time, in actual fact, before the ameliorating influence of air travel, bringing people together in a way no other transport can, paves the way for a fusion of the air lines of Europe.

In the meantime one has significant examples of the way the wind is blowing. Take the airplane route which, under German influence, is to be operated shortly from Berlin through to Madrid. Three companies, German, French and Swiss, are engaged in this enterprise, while a fourth concern of a Spanish character is to be formed to deal with the section of the line passing through Spain. Even more cosmopolitan are main lines stretching across Europe to Constantinople; and the suggestion now being debated is that, to facilitate telephony and the passage of routine messages, some international aerial language, such as an adaptation of Esperanto, should be used on lines extending through different countries.

This problem of language has been exemplified already in the choice of an international wireless telephone S O S or distress signal, to be called by a pilot should his machine be in risk of falling into the Channel during a flight between England and the Continent. "Help me" is the verbal signal desired. This, in the French signal, is "M'Aides," and, so as to make it sound exactly the same in English, the British equivalent is the call "Mayday." Enthusiasts believe that some form of air language, used first by officials on flying routes, would be adopted by degrees by passengers, and that this would presage the day when, through meeting each other so constantly, and employing the same language, the people of different countries would get to know each other so well that the risk would be obviated of such misunderstanding as might lead to war.

However Utopian this may seem, there is no doubt that we are on the threshold of flying progress in Europe which will have an influence upon the entire world. Not only with giant heavier-than-air machines, but also with immense rigid-type commercial airships, the plan now is to span vast distances by air. In construction in England, to the order of the Air Ministry, are two airships with 5,000,000 cubic feet of gas capacity, capable of carrying 100 passengers, and intended for testing the commercial possibilities of regular routes from England to India, and on to Australia.

Projected Trunk Lines

In Germany the Zeppelin Company are to begin constructing their 127th rigid airship, a machine larger than any they have built before, which is to be employed in experiments to secure data for the establishment of a commercial service between Germany and the United States. Zeppelin engineers now foreshadow world encircling airlines, oceans being flown by giant airships, and land sections traversed by multi-engined airplanes.

Several such great trunk routes are now engaging expert attention. One, starting from London, and totaling 30,000 miles, will stretch eastward to India and Australia, with an airship link across the Pacific to Central America, the South Atlantic then being crossed by airship to a base to be established at Seville, in Spain, from which airplane lines will radiate to all parts of Europe. Another projected line of about 18,000 miles is being referred to already as the "Great Northern" world route.

Starting westward from Berlin, it will be by airship to New York; thence across the United States by high-speed plane; then on from San Francisco by airship, say, to Vladivostok, and after this overland by the Transiberian airway to Moscow and back to Berlin.

It was Mr. Fogg, Jules Verne's famous traveler, who made his rush around the world by steamer, train, elephant and other primitive modes of transport in a total of eighty days. Ultra-modern travelers, using airships, airplanes and flying boats, will, according to time tables now being drafted, girdle the globe aerially by the swiftest routes, in a total of not more than ten days.

FROHMAN LIVES OVER STAGE MEMORIES

Veteran Theatrical Manager to Celebrate This Week Forty-four Years' Activity in New York—His Successes

By H. I. BROCK

FOR two generations, or roughly a matter of half a century, the name Frohman has been associated with the theatre in America. The persons solely responsible for that association are three brothers, born in Sandusky, Ohio, but early brought to New York by their parents.

As it happens, Charles Frohman, the youngest of the three, made the greatest name. When he went down with the torpedoed Lusitania off the Old Head of Kinsale, in 1915, he was the pre-eminent American impresario and, in spite of his short legs, bestrode the Atlantic like Colossus, one foot in New York—and one in London. As it happens, also, the oldest of the brothers is the only one whose active career covers practically that entire half century, though Gustave, the second brother, likewise survives.

Daniel Frohman, at 73, is still a power in the theatre. Though he no longer figures actively as a manager, his office in his Lyceum Theatre in Forty-fifth Street is, in a manner, the headquarters of the theatrical profession in the city. There, surrounded by souvenirs of his long service, he administers the Actors' Fund, of which he is the President. About him in the big room, cluttered with mementos of those who have gone before, he gathers the players of the present and the survivors of that past of which he is himself so important a part.

This week will see the somewhat belated formal celebration of forty-four years of responsible theatrical work by Daniel Frohman in this city, beginning with his business management of the Madison Square Theatre in 1879.

As Bill Poster

However, this New York beginning was not the true beginning of Daniel Frohman's theatrical career. After a five-year apprenticeship to life in general as office boy—on The New York Tribune, under Horace Greeley, and on The Daily Graphic of that period—the young man was inducted by his brother, Gustave, already in the show business, into the the job of advance agent for Callender's Original Georgia Minstrels. In that capacity he began to see the country. His company was made up of real negroes, not of burnt-cork blackfaces, and was in the '70s prodigiously popular.

Daniel traveled from coast to coast and from Maine to Texas. Sometimes he moved from town to town by horse and buggy hired at the local livery stable. Often, when he had arranged for the theatre or "opry house" or hall where the show was to be given, he had to go around the streets and stick up his own bills and posters. He likes to tell how he used every now and then to post one of the gaudy things upside down. That attracted attention. People looked who never would have looked if it had been right side up. But he could not trust the professional bill posters to carry out this topsy-turvy program. They were afraid people would think they went to work drunk.

Once, Mr. Frohman says, he was in the office of a theatre in the sticks when a portly person with a silk hat and a cigar in his face strolled in, booked his show and, remarking that "the printing" would "be along" on Monday, walked out again. His job was done. Daniel was just about to start out with his pastepot. From that time on he was more than ever resolved to be a New York manager.

Mr. Frohman relates with gusto this story: He walked into the Tremont Opera House in Galveston, Texas, and found his brother, Charles, there ahead of him. Charles was in advance of a legitimate theatrical company. He had booked his show for all of the next week. Daniel asked for part of the week for his show. Charles refused. "Then," said Daniel, "I'll hire a hall, stick up my bills and parade my brass band and I'll get all the business in town." Charles came hastily off his high horse. The fact was, it appeared, that Charles's company was traveling "on its trunks." That is, it hadn't enough money ahead to pay its hotel bills. In that situation Daniel managed by wire to get his minstrels, who were coming on by boat from New Orleans, rerouted. He switched them to Houston, gave Charles a clear week in Galveston and followed him there the week afterward. Here is testimony that the legitimate show had no more chance in those good old days against blackface minstrels and a brass band than Shakespeare would have now against a musical show with a beauty chorus.

Daniel Frohman.

From a Painting by I. Mortimer Block.

The Georgia Minstrels were especially popular in Boston. Real negroes meant something to Boston in the '70s, when the town was still ardently abolitionist. Mr. Frohman remembers a very grand night indeed at the Park Theatre, with among those present Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. By the way, he says he got the job as advance agent of the minstrels because he could write his press notices grammatically. That was where his newspaper training came in. You might begin as an office boy in a printing house in those days, but you learned a lot that wasn't running errands.

After fifty years, and after a metropolitan career that has brought him in touch with most of the notables of his time, it is clear that Daniel Frohman still remembers with deepest retrospective satisfaction those years of seeming hardship on the road. For then the road was the highway of adventure. Nothing was cut and dried beforehand.

You hunted the Snark. You dropped off the night train or drove up in your livery-stable buckboard. You found the theatre or a hall that would serve. You tried your company's luck. Scouting ahead for opportunities, you made your route as you went; discovered new one-night stands where none were before. In short, you backed your own judgment.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Frohman thinks it was probably because he had to do this that he got the top level of outward decency. The motto was "Wholesome Plays for Wholesome People." David Belasco had just been fetched in from San Francisco to be stage manager and the two young men were so absorbed in their new job that they spent almost all their time at the theatre. Frohman bought a cot and put it in the office so that he could sleep there; could work as late at night as he pleased and still be there as early in the morning as he thought he ought to be.

Those were the years just after the great days of Wallack's company, when A. M. Palmer and Augustine Daly were still shining lights of the local stage. They were also the days of Steele Mackaye's "Hazel Kirke," which launched the custom of No. 1, 2, 3, and so on companies, continuing the metropolitan successes upon the road. It is one of the few customs of that period that have survived as characteristic features of the theatrical world of the present.

There were thousands in it then; there are millions in it now—if rumor says anything like true. In 1881, two years after Daniel got his $35 job, William Gillette was added to the staff as playreader. Presently his play, "The Professor," was produced and promoted to the serial number class of multiple presentation.

Frohman, meantime, had been taken over by the Fifth Avenue Theatre and was fetched back to the Madison Square at a much higher salary. By the way, the veteran expresses himself in no uncertain terms in regard to the plays of this period. "Since," he says, "there is nothing dramatic in virtue, we had to do the best we could to make the virtuous drama dramatic in spite of this handicap." Hence the enormous importance of structure and of technique, both in the playwright and in the actors; hence, if you will, the obvious "theatricality" of these plays as we look at them today. Mr. Frohman records as late as Pinero's "Sweet Lavender" (1888) that it was necessary to remove the bar-sinister from the young heroine's escutcheon before the play would do for New York. Pinero consented, reluctantly, to this moral operation.

In 1896 Daniel Frohman took over the Lyceum Theatre in Fourth Avenue at Twenty-third Street, which had been launched by Steele Mackaye a year earlier. It was to become the home of the Lyceum Stock Company and was the chief scene of Frohman's enterprises until 1889. There in 1887 he made his first bow as a full-fledged producer, with "The Highest Bidder," which was so successful that it made a star out of E. H. Sothern.

Lengthened Petticoats

Belasco had become the Lyceum's stage manager, so that the original Madison Square team was again at work. Belasco, for a while, was also associate playwright for the concern, with W. C. De Mille as literary collaborator. Afterward both Pinero and Sardou contributed to the repertory. Shaw very narrowly escaped being taken in hand there, through Richard Mansfield. But the play was "Candida" and Shaw sent over with it Janet Achurch for the title part. After a rehearsal or two Mansfield cried off.

Mr. Frohman recalls the scandal that arose when in Haddon Chambers's play, "The Idler," Henrietta Crosman sat with somewhat elevated skirts close to the footlights. The critics exclaimed so loudly that he had to have her wear a longer petticoat. But the skirt stayed up. Very naturally he has not forgotten Maude Adams's first appearance at the Lyceum Theatre. It was with Sothern in "Lord Chumley," and she was "a very young, slight, fair-haired girl," who had just grown up enough to "wear long dresses." What an antique touch! Yet the year was only 1889. After Sothern, his next leading man was Herbert Kelcey, and after Kelcey came James K. Hackett, who has so recently died in Paris. Hackett began to be a frequenter of the Lyceum gallery when he was a student at the City College, which then stood just across the street from the little playhouse. The leading women included Georgia Cayvan, Isabel Irving and Mary Mannering. Henry Miller—also so recently dead—was the leading juvenile.

Many of the names that mean most to Daniel Frohman have already begun to fade from the modern memory. But among his stars were Modjeska and the Kendals. Impressive, even amazing, is the number of plays produced by him at the old Lyceum, at Daly's or elsewhere.

How One Man is Building a Fortune

FIFTEEN YEARS AGO—he had $1,000 to invest
TODAY—he has $31,100 in Straus Bonds
THIS YEAR—these bonds will earn $1,866 for him

WHEN one investor came to us, fifteen years ago, he had $1,000 to invest.

He wanted to invest that $1,000 so that he would secure —safety of principal,

—about 6% yield,
—prompt payment of interest,
—freedom from worry.

Straus Bonds, he found, met all of these conditions.

Then, together, we worked out an investment plan which he has consistently followed since that time.

Every year throughout the fifteen years, he has set aside an average of $1,200 for investment in Straus Bonds. The table in the center of this page shows how his plan has worked out.

Here is the remarkable thing about this man's fortune—

He has actually invested only $18,900 in cash to date.

Interest earned by his Straus Bonds has purchased $12,200—more than one third—of the securities he owns today.

These are the figures:

Original Investment	$1,000
Subsequent Investments 15 years	17,900
Total cash invested	$18,900
Interest earned by his Straus Bonds and reinvested	12,200
His total today	$31,100

HOW HE DID IT

First Step: Invested $1,000 in a 6% Straus Bond.

Second Step: Invested an average of $600 in Straus Bonds semi-annually for 15 years.

Third Step: Accumulated interest earned by his bonds to buy more bonds.

We will help you Outline a Workable Plan

You, too, can build a fortune and do it just as easily as this man.

The important thing is to determine how much you can set aside each month—and then stick by that determination. Remember that systematic investment is what builds fortunes. Be as prompt in making payments to your own future as you are in paying your current household bills.

Any officer or representative of S.W. STRAUS & CO. will be glad to discuss your personal investment problem and assist in outlining a plan exactly suited to your personal requirements.

In the past 44 years, we have discussed investment plans with tens of thousands of investors. These investors have purchased Straus Bonds totaling hundreds of millions of dollars. Offices of S. W. STRAUS & CO. today are located in nearly fifty principal cities of the United States, serving investors located in every state in the Union, every Canadian province and many foreign countries.

44 YEARS WITHOUT LOSS TO ANY INVESTOR

PARIS EMBASSY TURNS BACK TO FRANKLIN

the cabriolet for the secretary." One day in the following January, to the Minister's "immense surprise," the King himself, Louis XVIII, drove up to the American Legation. When the courier made the announcement, the Gallatin family were thrown into excitement, but the Minister said calmly:

"We will receive his Majesty in Quaker simplicity as behooves our Republic."

The King, who was very infirm, was received in the courtyard. He was accompanied by Monsieur and apologized for not getting out of his carriage. "He handed the Ambassadress a large roll, which was a very fine engraving of himself. 'To Mrs. Gallatin, with all the respect due to a woman who has principles, Louis.'"

"No such honor," reports the secretary, "had ever been paid by the King before."

Gallatin remained seven years, until 1823, when he was succeeded by James Brown of Louisiana. When Andrew Jackson became President, in 1829, he appointed W. C. Rives, a Virginian lawyer, to Paris. This Minister arrived in time to play a very important and perhaps decisive part in the revolution which placed Louis Philippe on the throne. It is a strange story. After the dethronement of Charles X the aged Lafayette held the key of the situation in his hands. Hesitating between a monarchy and a republic, he took Rives into consultation. How would the United States, which it was his chief object to propitiate, take the former choice?

The Popular Rives

Rives had made up his mind that under a limited monarchy France stood the best chance of peace and internal harmony, and being reassured that this view would prevail in America, Lafayette risked the anger of Cavaignac and the Republicans.

It is a curious thing that twenty years later, when the monarchy so established had been overturned, the Whig President, Zachary Taylor, sent Rives again to Paris as Minister, and he was there and on confidential terms with Louis Napoleon when the famous coup d'état took place and the Second Empire was established.

His successor, John Y. Mason, was not equally popular at court, and was, indeed said to have given offense to the Empress Eugénie by passing his hand over her beautiful shoulders at a Tuileries ball. It was probably the merest accident, but the gossips and caricaturists made the most of it, and the legend of Mason's indiscretion still persists. Mason died at his post in 1859.

The new Minister, W. L. Dayton, had a laborious and anxious time in Paris all through the American Civil War. Exasperated by spies and Confederate agents and by Napoleon III's Mexican schemes, his health suffered and he, too, died at his post, leaving his chargé d'affaires, John Bigelow (subsequently Minister), to continue the work of the legation. Bigelow had formerly been Consul General at Paris; after Lincoln's death he became at loggerheads with Secretary Seward and resigned. General John A. Dix, who followed him at the legation, proved a great success in Paris. Educated at Montreal, he spoke French fluently. He had been Secretary of the Treasury and filled numerous difficult and responsible positions at home. "But few American Ministers in France," afterward wrote his successor, Washburne, "ever made a better impression than General Dix." And among those few was Elihu B. Washburne himself.

When Washburne arrived the Second Empire was tottering; yet there was no lack of outward splendor and society. To the American colony in Paris, now larger than that of any other country, presentation at court was a much sought-after privilege, and at his first presentation Washburne broke all records by leading forward twenty-eight of his countrymen. Although the ladies were scarcely known to him, he announced their names to the Emperor and Empress with such assurance that Eugénie could not refrain from expressing her surprise.

"How is it possible, Mr. Washburne, that you could remember all those names?"

"Nine Congressional campaigns, your Majesty," replied the veteran politician from Illinois.

Washburne's first official duty was to attempt to negotiate a postal and telegraph treaty, upon which he actually labored virtually during the whole of his stay in France, but without success. This led him to remark that "there is no nation in the world more difficult to make treaties with than France. The questions arising, whenever a proposal for a treaty is made, are studied by the ablest men in the country, who are generally unwilling to negotiate treaties unless they can secure some decided advantage."

The New American Embassy, at Paris.

When the Franco-Prussian War broke out, Washburne, the only Foreign Minister to remain in Paris during the siege, took charge, at the King of Prussia's request, of the German Embassy. When the French Empire fell and a republic was proclaimed by Gambetta, America was the first nation to recognize it and shouts of "Vive l'Amerique!" rang out from fousands of French throats in the Paris streets. To a delegation which called at the legation the Minister felicitated France, "our ancient ally, on the accomplishment of that peaceful and bloodless revolution, which must challenge the profound interest of all lovers of liberty throughout the world."

Unfortunately, it was not destined to be either peaceful or bloodless, and Washburne's reports on the horrors and tragic excesses of the ensuing twelvemonth are among the most thrilling and impressive documents preserved today in the embassy archives and in the Department of State at Washington. The American Minister during the whole period played a more important part than any foreign envoy, purely a civilian, ever before played in the French capital. His relations with Bismarck were so cordial as to excite the astonishment of Lord Lyons, the British Ambassador.

"How did you manage to get round him?" he asked.

"Why, when I heard that he and his army were approaching Paris," replied Washburne, "I sent him a box of real Havana cigars and he never forgot it."

Among other privileges the American Minister was the only one in Paris who was allowed to receive the English newspapers, on condition that he would not divulge their contents. When the situation became intolerable French journalists besieged the legation, but Washburne was adamant. Journals like Figaro heaped him with reproaches. "We gave you Lafayette and Rochambeau, in return for which we only ask for one copy of The London Times." Washburne records this with amusement, but it was doubtless tragic enough at the time, and so far did he come to feel it that he wrote Bismarck refusing to receive any more newspapers. "I cannot be the only man in Paris who knows what is going on in the outside world."

"Such omniscience" he told a friend, "belongs to a God, not to a simple republican citizen. Whenever I step out of the legation a million pairs of eyes follow my every movement and try to pierce my thoughts."

Washburne's Successors

During the Commune Washburne, though unable to save the life of the aged Archbishop of Paris, succeeded in saving the lives and property of others. Persona grata to the Third Republic, he remained at his post until the Fall of 1877. His immediate successors were Edward F. Noyes of Ohio, Levi P. Morton of New York, Robert M. McLane of Maryland and Whitelaw Reid. Thomas Jefferson Coolidge served for a single year.

At the outset of the second Cleveland Administration the long-deferred elevation of the Paris post to the rank of embassy took place, and James B. Eustis, a Louisianian, became the first Ambassador. When President McKinley came into power he named an Ambassador whose memory is still held in affection. General Horace Porter served eight full years. When he resigned, in 1905, President Roosevelt appointed Robert S. McCormick to the embassy, who only two years later made way for one of the few American professional diplomats whose ambition had long been to crown his many years of service in London and elsewhere by being American Ambassador in Paris—Henry White.

At the beginning of 1910 the late Robert Bacon succeeded Mr. White, remaining only two years. He was followed by Mr. Herrick, who was Ambassador at the outbreak of war, and although superseded by President Wilson, remained on until November, 1914. His successor, William T. Sharp of Ohio, who will always be famous in France as America's representative during the war period, presented his letters of credence at Bordeaux, whither the Government had retired. Sharp had a trying time of it during the first two years, but later had his reward in the animated scenes in which the entire French people celebrated the advent of his country into the conflict. He was succeeded after the Armistice by Hugh C. Wallace, an ardent lover of France, the first Paris Ambassador to hail from the Pacific Slope. When he was recalled, upon a change of administration, in 1921, he continued to inhabit the beautiful hotel in the Place Jena, which he had purchased from Prince Radziwill, and now spends several months each year in Paris. Only three doors away, his successor, the former Ambassador, Myron T. Herrick, has established his embassy. This diplomat is now, like Minister Rives in Zachary Taylor's time, serving a second term as his country's representative.

NIGHT WORKERS OF NEW YORK GROW IN NUMBER

ever dark outside when the limp flat loaves of Washington Street, such as they ate in Palestine in the time of Christ, are put into their cellar ovens. Golden Vienna twists and crusty French bread are baked by night for the big hotels. It is night, too, when the wooden clapper of the Chinese baker, beating his soy-bean rolls, resounds through the courts of Chinatown. In many a cobbled alley the rattle of the baker boy's cart is inalienably a sound of the night.

So busy is the night life of the produce quarter that traffic cops must be on hand to straighten out congestion in the wee sma' hours. The consignees enter at 3 A. M. to take charge of wares that already have kept the piers swarming with workers for many hours. At 3:30 a gong is struck and a mob rushes in; it is like the second show crowd at the movies. Wholesalers, jobbers, commission merchants and the rest then bargain in tones soaring into argument or bid against each other. All the while the street outside echoes with the rumble of trucks hauling purchases off. Markets are agog with farmers from perhaps 150 miles away, with green grocers and produce men, picking and bargaining in preparation for the picking and bargaining to be done by the housewife on the morrow.

The lights in most of the New York buildings far downtown blink out when the evening is still young. But here and there the gleam that marks the elevator may be seen shooting up and down, and somewhere aloft is evidenced the burning of midnight oil. The offices of one of the leading lawyers in New York commonly keep going at least a part of the night, in the busy legal season. New York even puts the financial district to work at night. No longer may aspersions be cast on "bankers' hours." They now cover up to twenty-four a day. Within the mighty fortress of the Federal Reserve Bank a lonely force of clerks works all night, and other big New York banks have night staffs on duty to sort checks and make up mails, that time and interest money may be saved.

In the dark, narrow gorge of Cedar Street is one bright spot where at intervals the crowd coming and going might suggest a new sort of night club. It is the New York Clearing House. The day's work is over by 5 o'clock; then the night personnel arrives. Until 10 o'clock a more or less steady line of bank messengers stream past the long rows of desks at which sit clerks receiving checks to be cleared. After 10 o'clock a lull may be noticed in the street outside. But with midnight messengers begin coming again to collect the checks due their banks.

It is 3 o'clock in the morning before the Clearing House calls it a day. By that time more than half its exchanges are ready for posting when the bookkeepers arrive. The night service was instituted a few months ago to reduce the peak load at the morning exchange, when the Clearing House makes its daily settlement. Some years ago the Stock Exchange discovered that the day did not have enough hours for its work, and its night clearing branch has been operating ever since.

Perhaps New York eventually will recognize no difference between night and day. By the year 2000 there may be a day population and a night population, with an in-between population for the third shift. This would be one way for New York to accommodate more workers in a given working space.

There is always the obstacle of finding people who are willing to work at night. Any office that offers a choice between night and day jobs knows how difficult it is to recruit the night force. Why do people wish to be free at night? To some extent because they prefer to play in the radiance of white lights, but mostly because night is considered the best time for sleeping. Scientists, however, have already begun to toy with the idea that perhaps the time will come when, by artificial assistance, men will not have to sleep much, if at all. When that epoch arrives the choice shift will be from midnight on. Every day will be a picnic Sunday, with airplanes whizzing one off to southern beaches and other open spaces. There would be a rush for the night jobs. The problem then would be to keep New York's twenty-four-hour day from dwindling, at the call of sleepless pleasure, into an eight-hour night.

LEISURELY MAIL YIELDS FRENCH WAR LETTER

THE delivery of a letter that has been nearly seven years in making its way from Sing Sing to Brooklyn aroused interest the other day. But this record is surpassed by that of a letter which was eleven years in course of passage from Toulon to Paris.

On April 22, 1915, a man in Toulon mailed a letter to a friend in Paris. The war was on and lost letters were rather common. Receiving no reply, the writer assumed that his letter had been lost in the mails. Such, however, was not the case. It had merely gone astray.

A short time ago the Paris friend received it, and was not a little surprised to find his friend at Toulon asking him what he thought about the war situation. He was about to write, asking wrat he meant by the question so long after the event, when his eye rested upon a penciled post-office memorandum on the envelope. Posted eleven years before, the letter had been delayed in delivery "by an accident."

OUR PARIS EMBASSY TURNS BACK TO FRANKLIN'S DAY

Opening of Franco-American Diplomatic Relations 150 Years Ago Will Be Commemorated Overseas This Week

Thomas Jefferson, Who Succeeded Franklin.

One hundred and fifty years ago this week Benjamin Franklin arrived in Paris, thereby inaugurating Franco-American diplomatic relations. Next Thursday this event will be commemorated at a dinner in Paris, at which Ambassador Herrick will preside, with President Doumergue and Foreign Minister Briand among the guests.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, America's first Minister Plenipotentiary to France, set up his quarters at Passy, and today within a stone's throw of that spot and where his statue benignantly surveys the scene are clustered most of the official American associations in the French capital.

Here is the spacious Chancellery of the embassy, opposite are the homes both of the present Ambassador, Myron T. Herrick, and of his predecessor, Hugh C. Wallace. In the middle of the square, at the head of the Avenue du Président Wilson, is the imposing equestrian statue of Washington, while close by is the Place des Etats-Unis and the American War Memorial. Nor is this all. There is yet another link, another symbol. On the bridge at Passy rises the original of Bartholdi's "Liberty Enlightening the World."

It is as if the spirit of the venerable Sage of Passy had gradually drawn hither all these official, historical and sentimental interests of his American compatriots, and it is appropriate, therefore, that the century and a half of Franco-American diplomatic relations should receive commemoration at the adjacent Trocadero, whose tower rises like a minaret overlooking all the shrines of the exiled faithful at Passy.

During that long period from Franklin to Herrick America has sent to represent her thirty-eight Ministers and Ambassadors, as compared with just half that number of British representatives, the disparity being largely caused by the fact that two of the latter, Lord Lyons and Lord Cowley, served unusually long terms.

The beginning of Franco-American diplomatic relations was hardly auspicious. Until Franklin's arrival in Paris, Dec. 21, 1776, the American agents had been going about their business in a hole-in-the-corner way, and although his own fame had preceded him and made him highly popular in certain quarters, the Court refused to receive him and the Foreign Minister, Vergennes, actually sent a courier to forbid him to enter the city. Once he was there, Lord Stormont, the British Ambassador, watched his movements with suspicion, threatening to demand his passports if Franklin were received as envoy from the revolting Colonies.

Under the circumstances Franklin wisely resolved to play a waiting game. One of his most ardent French admirers, M. Ray de Chaumont, offered to lodge him in half of a large mansion which he owned at Passy, then a quiet suburb, and thither at the beginning of March, 1777, Franklin moved his books and papers and established what for the ensuing eight years was the American Legation at Paris. "Do not trouble about rent," his friend assured him. "When the independence of America is acknowledged it will be time enough to talk of that."

This first American Legation, the Hotel Valentinois, took its name from a certain lively lady, the Countess of Valentinois, to whom it had once belonged. It stood in the Rue Raynouard. It was lucky that Franklin had to pay no rent. That item in the case of a good many of his successors absorbed more than half and in some cases almost the whole of their official salaries.

John Adams, when he came to Paris, reported to Congress that Franklin was extravagant and indolent and "carried away by a love of admiration and flattery." He certainly entertained generously and maintained a staff of liveried servants. He kept a carriage and pair, which he appears to have been ready to lend to his friends, especially if they were young and pretty women. But on the official side, it is to be feared he was rather niggardly. For a long period there was no Secretary of Legation and the new Chancellery was unorganized. In fact, most of the duties were performed by his private secretary and grandson, William Temple Franklin, then a boy of 16.

"Forgive me, dear Doctor," wrote one of Franklin's friends, "for noticing that your Papers seem to lye a little loosely about your house. You ought to consider yourself as surrounded by spies and amid a People who can make a cable from a thread."

Juvenile Secretary

A Minister must economize somewhere, and child labor was a weakness of those days. Franklin took the hint and appointed another assistant in the person of Master Adams, afterward John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, then not 12 years old.

The French court held aloof as long as it could, but when at the end of 1777 came the news of Burgoyne's crushing defeat at Saratoga, the King resolved to acknowledge American independence, and a treaty with France was concluded the following February. The moment Lord Stormont heard of it he instantly packed up and left Paris and war between Britain and France began.

Yearly Franklin's fame and prestige increased in France. Diplomatically speaking, his worst time, and yet his greatest triumph, was over the joint Franco-American Treaty of Peace with Britain in 1783. The French were very suspicious of American intentions, and Vergennes declared roundly that several of the American demands were contrary to French policy. The situation was delicate, but the treaty eventually went through and Franklin remained in Paris universally respected until the Summer of 1785, when age and infirmities made him ask for his recall.

It was Thomas Jefferson, who, when Vergennes asked if it was he who had come to replace Dr. Franklin, replied:

"No one can replace him, sir. I am only his successor."

From his new legation Jefferson watched for the next four years the gathering storm of the French Revolution. He thought it was a purely political and economic crisis and himself suggested a panacea, to the King. It was "to import cut tobacco direct and take the revenue into the royal Treasury."

Following Jefferson's advice would probably have given the millions so sadly needed; but the King dared not break with the farmers-general who controlled the State revenue. The eminent American Minister in Paris lived long enough to realize how utterly he had been mistaken about the presages of the coming tempest, and the bloody incidents he calmly reports to the Secretary of State read very differently in the fervid pages of Carlyle.

Jefferson went home on leave soon after the fall of the Bastile, still thinking that all was well and intending to return. The brunt for the next two years fell upon the chargé des affaires, William Short, who was relieved at the beginning of 1792 by Gouverneur Morris. Morris, then in his thirty-eighth year, had been some time in Paris on private business. He entered upon his legation with that spirit and courage which have been so highly praised by his biographer, President Roosevelt. The solitary foreign representative in Paris during the Reign of Terror, he had many narrow escapes from violence. Once his wooden leg, the result of a carriage accident years before, saved him. The mob thought he was a mutilé of the War of Independence and broke into cheering. Morris did not undeceive them. On the other hand, he made little attempt to conceal his real opinion of the revolutionaries, and his official letters from Paris have been of the greatest service to the historian. Eventually the Committee of Public Safety demanded his recall, and Washington, who had resolved on getting rid of Genêt, the French Minister to America, yielded to the demand, and appointed James Monroe in his stead.

Elihu B. Washburne Served During the War of 1870.

Monroe was recalled in August 1796, and C. C. Pinckney of South Carolina sent in his stead. But the Directory refused to receive Pinckney, and even ordered Monroe to leave France. Franco-American relations forthwith went under a cloud lasting some years. When the terms of the Treaty of Commerce between Great Britain and the United States became known Talleyrand instantly ordered the capture of all American ships in French ports.

A treaty was finally arranged in 1800 with Napoleon, which released the United States from the obligations of the previous treaty of 1778, open war was averted, and in the following year Robert Livingston arrived as Minister Plenipotentiary to France. It was to Livingston that Napoleon unfolded his proposal for the sale of Louisiana, "the third greatest real estate transaction in history." But it was a former Minister and a future President, James Monroe, who was sent to negotiate the Louisiana cession, which was proclaimed Oct. 21, 1803. Thereafter matters went more smoothly for American Ministers in Paris.

Few names are today more respected in the annals of Franco-American diplomacy than that of Albert Gallatin, the talented Swiss who emigrated at 20 to America with a letter from Franklin in his pocket, and rose to be Secretary of the Treasury and Minister first to France and then to England. Gallatin was one of the Commissioners who negotiated the Treaty of Ghent and on his arrival in Paris in the Summer of 1816 fixed upon 21 Rue de l'Université as the site of his legation.

Despite his republican simplicity Gallatin purchased two pairs of fine horses to draw the "State berline" the brischke for everyday use an

SQUASH TEMPTS OLD GRADS TO EXERCISE

It Reduces the Waistline and Is the Fastest Indoor Game of All

By ALLISON DANZIG

"Played by Experts, Such as Tom Coward of Yale and Fillmore Hyde of Harvard, It Is So Bewilderingly Fast as to Make It Almost Impossible for the Spectator to Follow the Ball in Its Flight."

SQUASH tennis is becoming more and more the college graduate's game. Visit any of the large college clubs in New York of a late afternoon and you will find men of all ages, some of whose names are among the best known in the sporting annals of Yale, Harvard, Princeton and Columbia, knocking a ball around a four-wall court with a racquet a little smaller than a lawn tennis bat.

Squash tennis is probably the fastest of indoor games, with the exception of ice hockey. Played by experts, such as Tom Coward of Yale and Fillmore Hyde of Harvard, it is so bewilderingly fast as to make it almost impossible for the spectator to follow the ball in its flight as it streaks up and down the court and carroms off the walls at angles that keep the players catapulting themselves around the walled court to get to it. The successful squash tennis player knows his angles, just as the three-cushion and balkline billiards player knows his "diamonds," and the more he knows about them the less he has to exert himself to maintain position.

In spite of the swift pace of the game, which at times reaches a crescendo of cannonading that sounds like artillery, it is enjoyed as much by the old as by the young. Among the scores who are to be found daily on the courts are men of girth who are trying for a lesser waistline.

"The Game and Not the Gallery Is the Thing in Squash Tennis."

Others are playing simply for fun and for the glow that follows upon robust exercise. Still others are out there "diking" again for Yale or Princeton.

Men belonging in veteran ranks are members of the Metropolitan League teams engaging in the weekly championship matches. The veterans' champion, Harold Mixsell of Princeton, ranks as the third best amateur in the country and plays No. 1 on the Princeton Class A team and that is not saying anything against the standard of the competition in squash. One will not find the veterans of any other sport certainly not in golf or tennis rating as high as they do in this game; and squash tennis is every bit as strenuous as either.

It is in the college clubs that most of the top-notch players are to be found; but in the various athletic clubs the New York A. C., the Crescent A. C., the Montclair A. C. and the Old A. C. the sport is also expanding its vogue, and then there are the Whitehall Club, the Short Hills Club, the Gramercy Park Squash Club, the Interfraternity Club and the Heights Casino, all of which have courts and are represented by teams in the league play, which embraces twenty-eight teams competing in three divisions. In addition, some of the tennis clubs are beginning to install squash courts for use during the Winter, when tennis cannot be played. Instances of these are the Bayside Tennis Club and the Westchester Biltmore Country Club, which is not a tennis club, but has a large number of tennis courts.

It is natural that squash tennis should find favor with tennis players, for the two games have much in common, and the playing of one improves the player's ability at the other. William Tilden, Wallace Johnson, Jerry Lang and Fred Anderson are some of the better-known tennis players who know how to handle a squash bat. Lang this year made his début as a member of one of the Columbia University teams.

Johnson does not play squash tennis, but squash racquets, and ranks among the foremost players in the country. There is a distinction between the two games which their advocates are jealous to have understood. So intense is the scorn of the two sides for each other's game that the smoldering feeling is likely to burst into flame at any time.

Last Winter discussion as to the relative merits of the two games became so acrimonious that the leaders of squash and squash racquets in New York decided it was time to have a showdown. So they played a squash tennis-squash racquets match in which each side pitted its strongest line-up against the other, first at squash racquets and then at squash tennis.

The first half of the match was played at the University Club and the second half at the Yale Club. The racquetsers lost by a small margin; but, far from being convinced that the other game was the better, they ridiculed it all the more. The reaction of the squash tennis players was the same, and so neither side won any converts, nor lost any. Both games offer the opportunity for a half hour or an hour of inexpensive sport at any time of the day to the business man who cannot find the time to go to the country for his exercise.

It is only in the United States that squash tennis is played extensively. It is an American development of squash racquets, which is the game that is played almost exclusively abroad. In England squash tennis is almost unknown, and American players going abroad looking for exercise have had to turn to squash racquets, as in the case of Tom Coward, former national squash tennis champion and now the second ranking player in the country.

The Prince of Wales is an advocate of squash racquets, and recently startled army circles in London by taking two games from so highly rated a player as Captain H. McCormick in the army championships.

Even as far east as Siam the game of squash racquets has its votaries. In the opinion of King Praja Dhipok, "Squash is nothing less than a godsend to a country like Siam."

John D. Rockefeller Jr. is among the votaries of squash tennis. So keen is his interest in it that, in addition to having his own private walled courts, he financed the installation of a squash court at the Whitehall Club, in the Wall Street district, and two years ago played as a member of the Whitehall team in league competition. The Whitehall court is one of the busiest in the city. It offers opportunity for the business man to reinvigorate himself at luncheon hour or at the close of the market.

Court Tennis

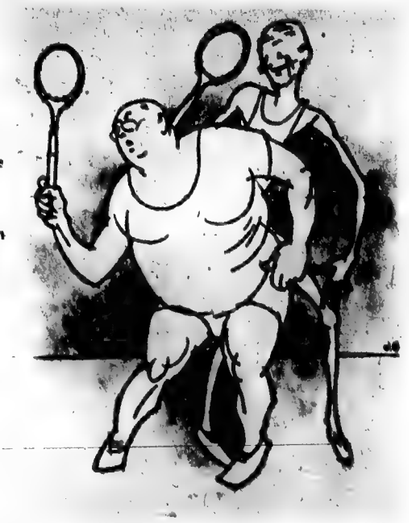
Hewitt Morgan, a member of the Harvard squash tennis team, is one of the highest ranking players in the country, while Jay Gould, until he retired last year from court competition, was also one of the leading figures and played several years ago at No. 1 on the Columbia team. And of course he also has stood for twenty years as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, amateur court tennis player in the world.

Court tennis and racquets, which are affiliated with squash in that they are played in a walled court with a racquet and a ball, also have their prominent exponents. In addition to Mr. Gould, who allowed his title to go by default last year, there are also C. Suydam Cutting of the Racquet and Tennis Club, the new champion, who was a member of the Roosevelt hunting expedition last year, and Hewitt Morgan, who is probably his most serious rival. Clarence C. Pell and Stanley Mortimer of Tuxedo are the two greatest racquet players in the country and between them have held the amateur title for eleven years, Pell winning it all but three of the years.

Court tennis and racquets, unlike squash tennis and squash racquets, are too expensive to be played by any but the very rich. There are hardly more than a dozen tennis courts in the United States, and the cost of building one runs to tens of thousands of dollars. There are two of them at the Racquet and Tennis Club and the East Court is a copy of the famous Hampton Palace Court presented by Cardinal Wolsey to Henry VIII. The floor of the court is made of a composition of concrete and an earthen material taken from the bed of the Thames. The court, along with historic documents pertaining to the game and furnishings that are hundreds of years old, were presented to the Racquet and Tennis Club by T. Suffern Tailer.

The retirement of Mr. Gould from competition and the end of his monopoly on the title is expected to stimulate interest in the championship and attract more competitors to it. But court tennis can never be the popular game that is squash tennis or squash racquets. It is to these latter two games that the college graduate is turning, particularly in New York. That graduates are turning to squash tennis in constantly growing numbers is evidenced not only by the increase in the number of the courts but also by the demand for courts at the various clubs. Coaches report that they have never been so busy as they are this Fall in instructing new recruits.

It is a far cry from the college gridiron with its stadium seating from 50,000 to 80,000 to the squash court with its gallery accommodating a mere 100 spectators; but the game and not the gallery is the thing in squash tennis. The criticism made against college athletics, that too many merely watch and only a bare handful get any physical benefit from sports, does not apply here. Not only the football stars of yesteryear, the basketball stars and the track stars, but also the men who watched them starring, are finding recreation and keeping in physical condition on the squash courts.



"Among the Scores Who Are to Be Found Daily on the Courts Are Men of Girth Who Are Trying for a Lesser Waistline."

ANTIQUES

A Monthly Publication

IT is not a fad: it is good business to buy good antiques for the home.

Each year of modern life increases machine production and decreases hand work. Each year removes us further from the fresh and unspoiled vision of the early designers.

A CENTURY and more ago, time was cheaper than now. Craftsmen then were more thoroughly trained. They lavished infinite care upon their work. Some materials, too — particularly cabinet woods — were superior to those of today.

Hence the things of olden time endure. Instead of becoming shabby, they ripen with age and use. And, while accident and carelessness steadily reduce their quantity, the number of persons who appreciate their quality increases year by year.

THAT is why money wisely invested in things antique brings not only dividends in daily satisfaction, but sure increase in capital value.

But wise investment implies both intelligent buying and reliable sources of supply. General recognition of that fact accounts for the extraordinary vogue of the magazine ANTIQUES.

FIRST in the American field of publication for collectors, ANTIQUES enjoys international recognition for its editorial brilliance, its sound and informing authority, its typographical excellence.

With text and picture ANTIQUES keeps its readers abreast of new discovery in the realm of furniture, glass, ceramics, textiles, firearms, silver, pewter, and other metal wares, American and foreign. It offers special guidance by carefully answering its subscribers' questions. It serves, in general, as a clearing house of ideas and information for collectors.

AS a market place ANTIQUES occupies an unique and enviable position. Its advertisements are as carefully and competently considered as its editorial material. No effort is spared to insure their beauty of appearance, interest of presentation, accuracy of statement.

In consequence, collectors, students, connoisseurs, and general buyers turn inevitably to the advertising pages of ANTIQUES, and study them with exceptional care.

ADVERTISERS know that their announcements in ANTIQUES bring them into nation-wide contact with the highest type of the American purchasing public.

And the public knows that an advertiser in ANTIQUES is himself not only well-informed, but, in all his dealings, to be relied upon.

A TEACHER OF TEACHERS PAUSES

Dean Russell Lightens His Burden but He Is Not Lost to Education

By MILDRED ADAMS

WITH the resignation of James Earl Russell, Teachers College loses the Dean who gave it personality and success. But it is keeping the man, for although Dean Russell believes that the work of administration should be carried by a younger man, he is not ready to retire from active school work. He turns over the dean's office to his son, William Fletcher Russell, and finds himself free to take up a task for which he has long had plans but not time—that of acting as supervisor, guide and friend to young instructors and young educational experiments.

Dean Russell found Teachers College a small private normal school, attended by 160 young girls who came to learn how to teach children. He built it into an institution whose educational leadership is unquestioned. Nearly 5,000 men and women attend its regular sessions—all of them college graduates preparing to be teachers of teachers, superintendents, deans, college presidents. Many of them come from foreign countries, either on their own initiative, or sent by their Ministers of Education as Government representatives.

The physical evidence of Dean Russell's twenty-eight years' work is the long block of red buildings up on the hill, where 120th Street looks east and west to both rivers and south across the busy Columbia campus. But that row of buildings, solid and substantial as it is, is only the shell of his accomplishment. The body of it lives and breathes and works in every State in the Union and nearly every country in the world.

When the Commissioner of Education in Juneau puts on snowshoes and starts out with his dog team to look over Alaskan schools he goes under the stimulus of Dean Russell's inspiration. When the head of the American School in Tokio greets his black-haired Japanese students, Dean Russell's spirit is with him. Thousands of refugee children in the isles of Greece are under the care of one of his students. The Commissioner of Native Affairs for South Africa guides the destinies of his millions of negroes with the aid of Dean Russell's teaching. Iceland, Panama, India, Jamaica, Spain, Canada, Norway, Cuba, Nicaragua, all these and many more bear witness to the strength of his influence.

Dean Russell is a quiet, modest man, Scotch by ancestry. His contemplative face, with its broad forehead and aquiline nose, has something of the power and dignity associated with fine old Roman orators. For more than a quarter of a century he has watched the course of educational development and has helped it on its way.

"Vast changes have taken place in a comparatively short time," he told his caller. "Yet they have come so gradually that one must deliberately think back to the old ways before one realizes their enormous importance. I should say that two of them are fundamental. One is the extraordinary change that has come over the whole of American life with the speeding up of transportation and intercommunication. This is reflected in the school children. The other is the shift in the public attitude toward education.

"Take my own boyhood"—the picture brought a smile to his lips. "Mr. Greeley's Tribune came to us in the mail once a week. It was a small sheet, and we read every word of it and believed every word. We thought Mr. Greeley wrote all of it, including the ads. It was our most vivid intellectual stimulus, the thing that kept us in touch with the world outside our small town.

"Contrast that with the life of modern children. They are assailed by printed and spoken words from breakfast to bedtime. Newspapers are cried at them from every corner; hundreds of magazines blaze at them; movies show them pictures and radio feeds them by ear. Stimulus and excitement prick them on every side, and as a result they are animated question marks, intensely curious, demanding to know, impatient of old ideas and very reluctant to accept anything as true that cannot be proved to their satisfaction. They want to know what it is all about, and we must be able to tell them. That means that we must first find out for ourselves.

"The other change is the shift in attitude toward the schools, from one of individualism to one of public cooperation and responsibility. Thirty years ago a child's education was his own affair and that of his parents. The child was taught the local version of the three R's; if he got as far as college he was taught classics and was turned out an educated gentleman. But no one planned his school work in terms of citizenship.

"Thirty years ago there was hardly a public high school on Manhattan Island. Today the public high schools educate thousands of New York children, and the costs of that education are mounting every year. The people have taken the responsibility of educating the next generation, and they have the right to expect that it shall result in public benefit.

"Good citizenship as an aim in life is nothing new; but as a dominant aim of the American public school it is new. It brings almost a revolution in the choice of materials of instruction and puts an entirely new emphasis upon methods of teaching. It subordinates the disciplinary values of studies, and puts added emphasis on the formation of character through precise knowledge and approved modes of behaving calculated to produce a predetermined result. For the first time in history, as I see it, a social democracy is attempting to shape the opinions of oncoming generations.

"That calls for research and a scientific attitude. If our schools are to aim toward public betterment, we must know what constitutes public betterment. What works toward public welfare, and what is inimical to it? No one is yet in a position to say; but the difficulty is that every one thinks he knows. This group and that has a cure-all that would turn out perfect citizens if only it were tried. One of the hardest tasks of the school administrator is going to be the handling of the ever-increasing groups that want to direct school policies and school subject matter.

"All this means study and experiment. For the last twenty-five years, in Teachers College, we have been collecting facts, testing them against each other, making comparisons, drawing tentative conclusions. It has been the beginning of a scientific movement in education; a movement that will go on with increasing sureness until school work is based upon fact instead of upon opinion.

Psychology's Contribution

"Education took its first important step toward becoming a science when psychologists invented a method of measuring individual differences in the capacity of children. Teachers had always known that some children learned quickly and that others were slow, but they had no way of expressing it. Suddenly they were able to study how the minds of children work, how knowledge is acquired, how attitudes and ideas develop.

"That invention sent a thrill through educators and psychologists, and stimulated them to tremendous effort. The scientific output in this field since 1900 is little short of marvelous."

Dean Russell has done more, perhaps, than has any other individual to raise teaching from an under-paid, under-trained job, considered in the lower schools as a fit occupation for "a lady reduced in circumstances," to a profession demanding the highest type of intelligence and training, and paying accordingly. It is estimated that one out of every seven of the trained teachers in the United States have come under Dean Russell's direct influence.

His first step was an arbitrary raising of standards in the college so that they conformed to university grade. His latest official step, taken this year, is another raising of standards. This time Teachers College becomes entirely a graduate school, demanding that its students have college, technical, or normal school degrees.

Dean Russell is gifted with a vision that senses potentialities not yet revealed. One by one he chose for positions on his Faculty men whose names have become internationally famous. Dr. E. L. Thorndike, who is creating modern education psychology, was picked out of a zoo of rabbits and chickens, which served as a laboratory of animal psychology. Dr. John Dewey, widely known as a philosopher; Dr. George Strayer, who is making a science of school administration; Dr. Paul Monroe, who, as head of the International Institute, is now an educational ambassador to all foreign lands; Professor Patty Hill, of nursery and experimental schol fame, who knows more about the behavior of youngsters than does the wisest mother—these and many more Dean Russell chose before their unusual powers had been tried.

He wisely left to them the working out of their own ideas. He works with them as far as their relations with the college are concerned, links their experiments and their interests with existing work, but does not dictate policies or methods.

It was in 1897 that President Seth Low called James Earl Russell, then a young Professor of Education, from his classroom and told him he was to be the new Dean of Teachers College. "This neighborhood was a squatter section in those days." Dean Russell gazed out of the windows of the new hall that bears his name. "Columbia hadn't moved up here yet, and except for three small buildings this block was vacant grazing land. I can see that bent old Irishwoman now, milking her four cows every afternoon just about the time classes were over and carrying the milk in tin pails to the dilapidated squatter cottages."

How Dean Russell put sturdy, financial feet under the tottering college, how he nursed its thousands until they grew into millions, is a story of great ability in handling money. The physical plant of Teachers College is now worth $7,000,000. It has an endowment of more than $3,000,000 and an annual budget of $3,500,000. More than 85 per cent. of its running expenses is met by student fees, a record approached by no other large college in the United States. The Dean takes no credit for this achievement.

"There are three main causes for the growth of the college," he said. "The constant, loyal financial backing of the trustees has enabled us to keep our equipment adequate to the increasing demands made upon it; our affiliation with Columbia University has meant that we could offer an almost unlimited number of courses to supplement direct professional work, and at the same time our independent existence has left us free to experiment, again, our position in New York City has meant that we could offer students all the advantages of metropolitan surroundings."

ART COLONY PLANNED FOR KING ALBERT'S ISLE

Beautiful Comacina in the Lake of Como Will Be Inhabited Again After Many Centuries

By CLAIR PRICE

COMO.

THE Lake of Como has been a professional beauty for two thousand years, and the only way to get along with a professional beauty is to avoid her if you can. But when she has an only island, a mere tuft of green half hiding a small white church with a stubby square tower of pink, and when a King, two Governments and a world-famous art academy suddenly put their heads together over its future, then something has to be done about it.

King Albert of Belgium brought his Queen here a couple of years ago to take a look at his island in Italy, but the Lake of Como is as temperamental as she is beautiful, and she behaved outrageously. She wept. She howled. She hid herself behind sheets of rain and refused to come out. She absolutely disgraced herself. The luckless King of the Belgians, standing in a wet and shiny slicker on the deck of a Como steamer, took a single look at his island looming vaguely through the rain and came back to the town of Como and gave it away to the nearest art academy.

It did not happen quite as bluntly as that, but that was what it amounted to. Exactly how it happened will be related here shortly. The nearest art academy, the famous Brera of Milan, has engaged Gaetano Moretti, also of Milan, the most widely known of modern Italian architects, to make its island an international home for artists, another of the many jewels that adorn the Lake of Como. For not all the ups and downs of her highly uncertain temperament can estrange the Lake of Como from her ancient and abject admirers, the Milanese.

She happened to be in a better humor the other day. She was in fact in one of her most irresistible humors. She began the day with one of her stock sunrises, a glow of thin light which picked out the dark profile of her eastern shore and shot up the eastern sky in long streamers of pink, of orange, of flaming red and finally of pure cold sunlight which reached across to pick the summits of her western shore out of the night.

That was just to show what she could do if she really wanted to. She was not half trying, and in any event she gave you no time to think about it, for almost before you knew it the sunlight was dropping down her western slope, revealing a steep confusion of green shoulders and gullies—down until it touched the highest villas, startling whites and pinks amid the green, with windows which caught the daylight and flashed it back in dazzling rays, down until it brought out in the lingering night the rows of villas half-smothered in masses of green at the water's edge, still down it lay along the crystal green surface of the water in long shafts of bright silver. Almost before you knew it, it was day, and the long narrow trench of the Lake of Como, the most famous professional beauty among the world's lakes, lay bathed in the young daylight.

Taxi to Deserted Isles

The island was nowhere in sight. It lies ten miles up the long narrow lake from the town of Como at the foot of the lake. The way is usually by steamer up the lake to the village of Osuccio on the west shore and thence a boat to the island, but the first steamer proved to be a direct Bellagio steamer, so a taxicab was summoned instead. It had been represented as a deserted island and this tip is passed on to other intrepid explorers. In discovering deserted islands, always take a taxi.

Plan Submitted by One of the Competing Architects for the Islet of Comacina in Lake Como

The fact that the shore road was under repair for a little way outside the town necessitated an inland detour which tinkled the bells on the Swiss frontier before the cab got back to the shore road a mile or two up the lake. There is always the sense of something big impending on the shore road. Although the sky is of the purest Italian blue, the lake is so narrow that its towering opposite shore is reflected like a dark thundercloud in the mirror of the water a foot or two below the roadside.

Perhaps, too, the fact that the road winds continually, that the view ahead is always cut off within a few yards by a thick wall of green foliage on one side or by a cream-colored stone boat-house on the other, contributes to the sense of something sudden, impending. You are never quite sure when a big car suddenly shoots around a curve just ahead whether its driver is going to turn to the right to pass you or is going to lose his head and pile into you by reverting to the road rules of his distant home and turning to the left. Ox-carts, a flock of goats, a peasant woman bending beneath a towering load of fresh-cut grass, a huge char-à-banc laden with English schoolma'ams doing Milan and Como in a single day from Lugano, a local prizefighter jogging by the roadside in a brilliant crimson jersey, and always a succession of big cars dusted heavily with white, their passengers heavily veiled and goggled—the Lake of Como, like the famous professional beauty she is, fills her shore road with admirers from all of Europe, and the result is that you never quite lose the sense of imminent adventure in speeding north toward the royal islet of Comacina.

Augusto Giuseppe Caprani, Mayor of the little west shore village of Sala, used to own the island and planned for a time to build an inn on it. But although it had not been permanently inhabited since it served as a refuge for persecuted Christians in medieval days, it was so obviously one of the jewels of the lake that Signor Caprani was unwilling to risk its beauty by entrusting it to a minor architect. Nor was he willing to begin a project whose completion might fall into less conscientious keeping, for he himself was an old man. Furthermore, there were two small areas of archæological interest on it which had already yielded some return and might, if strictly safeguarded, yield more.

Eventually he settled upon an odd solution of his problem. He made his will on Aug. 4, 1917, and, desiring to "leave a souvenir of the sympathy of Italy with the King and population of Belgium," he bequeathed the island to King Albert, adding in his will, "I hope that this bequest will be productive of good also to my native village." In such circumstances the expression of a mild consternation is hardly one of the royal prerogatives. King Albert accepted the bequest and came into unreserved ownership of the island when Signor Caprani died on Oct. 7, 1919.

Consulted With Milan

What happened next was that King Albert consulted his Minister of Science and Art in Brussels as to how the gift might best be disposed of in view of the donor's thought for his village. Jules Destrée, the Minister, consulted the Belgian Ambassador in Rome, and there the matter rested until an evening when Denis Raoult, an attaché of the embassy who had been much in touch with Italian artists during the war, happened to be dining in Rome with Giovanni Beltrami, President of the Brera Academy in Milan. In the Brera, Milan ranks with Rome, Venice and Florence as one of the great treasure houses of Italian art. The Brera's gallery is one of the famous art galleries of Europe, so famous that it tends to obscure the high position which the academy occupies in other branches of art.

It was the Brera's President who first suggested that the island should be given to the academy, which would undertake to create a new centre of life upon it which would harmonise with the beauty of its surroundings and would be of advantage to students of art and to working artists. The suggestion was conveyed to Minister Destrée in Brussels and through him to King Albert, who accepted it on May 18, 1920. Shortly afterward the King went to Italy and attempted to pay a visit to his island, only to find the Lake of Como in the midst of one of her tantrums. He continued on his way to Rome, and there he signed the deed which conveyed the island to the Government of Italy, by which it was reconveyed to the Brera Academy at Milan.

The uses to which table glasses may be put have increased, strange to say, in recent years. And now that it is permissible to have either all the glasses at a plate the same color or each one a different color, the frigidity of a table set with all white crystal has given place to a warmer effect more in keeping with the prevalence of color in all household furnishings.

With goblets, sherbet glasses, parfait glasses, oyster-cocktail glasses, fruit glasses and glasses we still call wine glasses, there is a wide range for the designer's and glassmaker's art and the hostess's taste in making the modern dining table a decorative ensemble. Forms inspired by great periods of glass design in the past may be used side by side with modern patterns, which in the best makes carry a suggestion of the past while possessing a distinct touch of modernism. For in table glasses one may exercise the same eclectic choice of period and form and color as is done in selecting the different bits of furniture for a room.

It is interesting to see how the current desire to allow as much as possible of the nature of glass to come out has affected glassware design. The old types of engraved glass always had the engraving design left gray. Nowadays the design is polished. This is part of the tendency toward greater limpidity, clearness and simplicity of form. Another characteristic of the best craftmen in glassware today is that of allowing the accidental departures from some perfect standard of form and design to remain in the finished product. For many years glassware in America attempted to reach the perfection of lapidary art wherein a geometrical accuracy of form and the perfection of a flawless gem were desired. This has been accounted for by the fact that in the past much glassware was sold by jewelers, who selected it according to their standard for gems.

Today a fine piece of table glassware contains less mechanical perfection and more evidence of handwork. Color flows in vagrant flushes through the glass, the engraved designs are less stiff in execution and show variation one from the other; in the subtleties of form the flowing character of the glass when it is being worked is taken advantage of, and the finished piece is left to frankly suggest to the acute observer that it was made by human hands and not turned out by machine. Such qualities have made examples of Venetian glass, old English glass and some early American glass highly treasured by the connoisseur.

The way color is used in these modern table glasses seems to the layman an astonishing triumph of the glassmakers' art. In some examples a violet tone diffuses itself through the glass, and as the piece is turned in the light the tint darkens or deepens. And in more deeply colored pieces the light as it strikes the glass gives it a quality that one finds on the surface of a gem.

In designs inspired by old Italian art one sees threads of glass, perhaps in black, used to build a spiral decoration on the outside of a tall and slender orange colored goblet. Or small rosettes in color are attached to the outer surface of a drinking glass in the manner of Venetian art.

MODERN fire resisting brick in the fireplace eliminates the need nowadays for the old-time protective fireback of iron. Nevertheless, an increasing number of homes are adding a telling note of quaintness to their fireplace through the use of one of the decorative Colonial, English or French plates of molded iron.

In some antique shops one may find an ancient fireback, one that has the sentimental value of being of the days when fireplaces were necessities and not luxuries. Shops dealing in fireplace fixtures offer reproductions which to casual inspection seem old. These are careful copies from the best of the old firebacks, the originals of which are in museums or are cherished as heirlooms in private homes.

But when buying an original fireback one must be sure it is not a hearth plate or a stove plate. Hearth plates were once used to protect the floors in front of hearths, and with their simple decoration have been found, and mistakenly cherished, as firebacks. Stove plates, from a forerunner of the iron stove made by Pennsylvania Germans, have deceived hunters of old firebacks. These plates, most of them decorated with biblical scenes or floral designs, formed an iron box into which the hot ashes of the fire were placed to give added heat to the room.

Molded From Rope

The earliest English firebacks—those made before 1600—display the efforts of the iron molder to decorate the surface as best he could. Fleur-de-lys, roses and crests, together with cruder designs, were placed upon the surface, with little regard to symmetry. The rope patterns often seen in early pieces were made by taking an impression in the mold of pieces of rope.

Later the use of coats-of-arms as a decoration on the firebacks was introduced. Of these the most popular designs today are those that go back to the reign of Charles I. Often the date when it was made was placed on the fireback, and sometimes the initials, "C. R."—Charles Rex—together with the royal coat-of-arms are found. Of these latter the lion and the unicorn supporting the English crown are molded in high relief and show great virility of drawing on the part of the unknown artists.

The general shape of the fireback in the early part of the seventeenth century was that of an oblong with the top edge broken into a semi-circular form. Later, under the influence of the Dutch and German firebacks imported into England, the taller and narrower form with a curved top became the style.

Designs commemorating historical events, such as the defeat of the Spanish Armada, were also placed on firebacks. These nautical designs often included a ship's anchor with a rope formed in a pattern around it. Uncouth satyrs oddly combined with vine leaves and bunches of grapes were other decorative motifs found associated with the anchor design.

French designs lean toward classical subjects—cupids, garlands, flowers, curves and scrolls. In the French as well as in the Italian firebacks the more sophisticated designs of the Renaissance are apparent.

In the latter part of the seventeenth century Dutch and German firebacks influenced the British design. The Dutch were particularly fond of flowers, and many firebacks have come down ornamented with a vase of more or less natural-looking blooms surrounded by a garland.

In America the iron furnaces of Pennsylvania supplied many of the firebacks used, and the decorative ideas of the Pennsylvania Germans of that day showed in floral and religious designs. Other furnaces in other parts of the Colonies also supplied their share of this useful fireplace fixture. Iron was cheap and to cast a fireback after a wooden pattern had been cut was a simple process. In the new country, however, the use of firebacks was not general; only the more prosperous among the Colonists had them.

GIFTS FOR THE WHITE HOUSE

One reason for the abundance of animal gifts has been the White House children. Tad Lincoln had ponies and a nanny goat given to him. The Roosevelt children had at various times a whole menagerie, including a pet badger, a calico pony and innumerable guinea pigs.

A President's family, themselves excluded from the political controversies that sometimes hit the Chief Executive, is the centre of national affection. When President Coolidge's father was ill, suggestions for his welfare poured in, and many of the remedies mentioned were old-fashioned cures of the countryside. When the President's son died in 1924, innumerable verses, clippings and portraits were received as tokens of the sympathy of the American people.

There is no gift day comparable to the occasion of a White House wedding. When Alice Roosevelt was married in 1906, there was a mountain of gifts. They came from most of the crowned heads of the world, including an antique gold bracelet studded with diamonds from the Kaiser of Germany and a mosaic table from the King of Italy. A Baltimore citizen gave her a cake two and one-half feet high, and the wife of a Confederate General presented a drawing of the Georgia home of Miss Roosevelt's maternal grandmother.

The President's Christmas, gifts and all, is little different from that of thousands of his countrymen. Last year it was reported that he rose earlier than the rest of the household and peeked at some of his presents ahead of time, for which he was properly censured. On Christmas eve, singers from one of the Washington churches gather at the north entrance of the White House and sing Christmas carols.

Three years ago, the first Christmas that the Coolidges spent in the White House, their friends in Vermont cut down and sent them a huge Christmas tree. It was set up in the ellipse south of the Executive Mansion and was covered with a myriad of colored lights, attracting great throngs of admirers. The next year, a live tree was planted and when the decorations were removed it was left to grow. Each year that it lives it is to be covered with tinsel and lights. Thus it happens that when the holidays are over, the President has a Christmas tree all the year around, appropriate enough for one to whom gifts never cease coming while he is in the White House.

CALYPSO'S ISLAND LIES IN FRENCH RIVER

ONE may search in vain on maps of the Aegean Sea or in the gazetteer for Calypso's Island. It is not there, though every reader of the "Odyssey" and of Fenelon's "Telemaque" knows the island well. As a matter of fact, search elsewhere than among the Isles of Greece will reveal an island thus named; it is in France, in the Dordogne River, says Andre Lamande, who delights in antiquarian research as well as in writing up-to-date novels.

Formerly called Barrade, or Bourgnon Island, it was the property of Fenelon himself. He renamed it Calypso's Island. The Archbishop of Cambrai made no mention of it in his will, and his surviving relatives and the monks of the Carennac Monastery disputed among themselves for its possession. Thus they wrangled until the Revolution, when it was declared the common property of the taxpayers of that district.

Then the question arose: How to divide it equitably, seeing that its surface was variegated, woodland and meadow? A leveling process was agreed upon. The century-old trees were uprooted and the whole island was made a bare, level tract. In this condition nobody wanted it, even when it had been divided according to the laws of justice.

Now, after many years, new trees have grown and Calypso's Island is again a place of beauty, worthy to have been the home of the enchantress of Ulysses and of Telemachus.

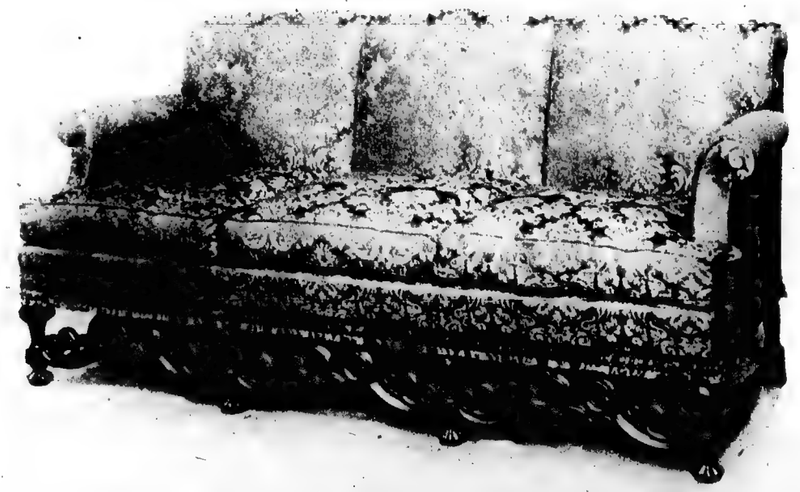
NATIVE DAMASKS ACHIEVING DISTINCTION

Silk Weaves Now Compete With Those Of Europe's Looms—Table Glasses Acquire a Decorative Value



Modern Made Satin Damask Aids in Recalling Period Effects.

By WALTER RENDELL STOREY

AMONG the beautiful things displayed at the industrial art exhibition now on view at the Metropolitan Museum are the silk damasks—those aristocrats of decorative fabrics. More noteworthy even than their beauty and technical excellence is the fact that they were made on American looms. In the last few years the weaving of this preeminent fabric has developed to such a degree in America that our damasks successfully compete with the European product. The examples shown at the museum are representative of weaves that one may get in decorators' shops.

Damask, once restricted to drawing or other formal rooms, has today under that less ceremonious American practice which combines different fabrics and furniture forms in all rooms of the home come into much more general use than ever before in its long history. In this adaptation to our twentieth century life, two extremes of patterns have evolved. One is characterized by new color effects, the other simulates a fabric dulled and worn by age. And under good decorators or discriminating householders, damask-covered furniture and window and other draperies are successfully associated with fine furnishings of many periods, including our own virile one.

Named for Damascus

The damask weave, as George Leland Hunter has pointed out in his authoritative book "Decorative Textiles," is a fabric on which the pattern is brought out by the lines of its weave running in a different direction from that of the ground. The linen damask tablecloths illustrate this simply. In modern damask there are incorporated with the traditional silk other materials, such as cotton, linen, wool and artificial silk, in order to produce new effects. The fabric is, however, made in essentially the same manner as in the twelfth century, when it got its present name from the city of Damascus, then famous for the beauty of its silks of this character. Most of the designs used in damasks today are copies of those woven centuries ago in Italy, Spain or France. This varied background allows the damask-covered chair, couch or window draperies to fit into the prevalent vogue for Spanish, Italian, French or Georgian interiors. Though damask weaving was not an English art, the English decorators of the eighteenth century used large quantities of Italian damasks, both for furniture coverings and as hangings for walls.

In France, the period of Louis XVI developed many beautiful symmetrical designs, often with stripe effects combined with flowers and leaves. Large floral motifs were also characteristic of that period of dignified luxury. Most of the Italian weaves now reproduced hark back to Renaissance motifs, wherein the pomegranate, the apple of love of medieval times, surrounded by flowers and leaves, often forms part of the pattern. Wonderful tones of color are found in some of these old Italian fabrics—violet and crimson, or an old gold that has the Cinquecento charm.

While the best designs of damasks are derived from precious bits preserved in museums, there are also patterns inspired by the life of today. Some designs suggestive of Japan are in brilliant reds, like those employed in lacquer; the straight trunks of the bamboo are shown against misty mountains and violet clouds. Especially modernistic is a pattern of new flower forms that may have been inspired by roses, but it is removed from reality by diagonal rays of darker tones that slant across the pattern. Delicate peach, jade or other hues, never used by the old Italian and French damask weavers, make these modern weaves distinctive.

New effects are also achieved by varying the color arrangements of old designs. In some patterns the background, instead of being of solid color, is made up of many minute threads of reds and greens and purples in light and dark tones. And the use of wool and cotton provides new textures to contrast with the silk. A few daring weaves in this mode have at first glance little resemblance to the smooth sheen of the traditional damask weave.

The vogue for the old has encouraged the weaving of damasks of old designs which have the appearance of age. A Spanish design in gold will have threadbare places on its thinly worn surface, with the dull though beautiful hue that good color assumes after two hundred years or more of wear wonderfully duplicated. Some of the fabrics thus antiqued are too thin for upholstery of chairs, but may serve admirably as window hangings. Others woven for furniture coverings belie their decrepit appearance by their durability, and the householder who buys a piece of furniture covered with this ancient-looking modern fabric may expect as much service from it as if it did not simulate great age.

Although damask-covered furniture gives in the formal reception room an air of luxury and dignity that only a few other fabrics can achieve, pieces of damask-covered furniture are not inharmoniously introduced into less formal quarters. Because of its use in the times of Charles I and Charles II in England, and also in the days of James II and later, a damask upholstered chair or couch may be associated with Georgian wood blocked chintz-covered chairs as well as with Jacobean embroidered fabrics. Furniture covering of needlepoint also seems to have a special affinity for the formal Varied Colors and Many Forms Are Now the Vogue in Table Glasses.

A Modern Reproduction of an English Fireback, Dated 1619.

THE present fashion for color and new forms in table glasses is giving designers and glassmakers much encouragement. Dining tables in their prismatic sparkle are recovering a note in decoration, the counterpart for which must be sought in old Venetian days. So, appropriately, another of the important displays at the Industrial Art exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum is of glassware.

Interesting as are the table glasses selected for this exhibition, they represent only a few of the many varieties that one may find in the shops. New shapes, delicate coloring and the accidental individualities that every piece of glassware made by a

NIGHT WORKERS EVER ON THE INCREASE

Nocturnal Tasks in New York Maintain the Busy Hum of Labor a Full Twenty-four Hours

By FRANCES D. McMULLEN

NEW YORK'S work, like woman's, is never done. The setting sun that signifies the close of one man's working day summons another man to his job. There is no hour when all New York is united in stillness and sleep. He who has spent a wakeful night in the city knows that the sounds of the evening do not cease in the streets before those of the day begin. The stroller abroad finds windows, whole buildings, aglow even until dawn, and behind those lighted panes are men at work.

The tremendous momentum the city works up during the day could hardly come to a halt at the turn of the signal "Stop!" No more could the "Go-Go" flash suddenly set her off again. Like all big bodies New York must have time to get under way and time to run down. Between the two she finds herself going in some degree constantly.

On the banks of the Wabash and the shores of Salt Lake New York's night means the White Way—musical shows and night clubs. But the New Yorker's night may also be one of toil. One man's amusement is ever another man's work. Electric signs could not scintillate were not men in power houses busy through the night. Musical shows could not dart their naughty worst across the footlights, nor could night clubs serve up early morning refreshments, if man's work were really done with the coming of dark.

The nightly appearance upon New York's streets of hordes looking for something to do prompts many a daytime idler to oil up his machinery and get down to business. The sounds that emerge by day from shops, earmarked as auction centres by the conglomeration of decorative art in their windows, are nothing to their noises at night. Then do auctioneering tongues wag most glibly:

"Real imported tapestry, what am I bid, what am I bid? Two dollars—a washrag that size would bring as much. Two dollars and a half I am bid, three dollars. Three, three, three. Three-fifty, three-fifty; four. Any more, any more?' Why, ladies and gentlemen, the duty alone was more than that——"

One moves on, and the vocal organs of those who live by the lure of "Chinatown at night" command the ears. Again nightfall and its crowds add impetus to the labor of those who stand on the sidewalk vending gewgaws or playing melodeons for the pennies of the passing throng. Nightfall, too, points up the pursuit of him who calls you to his telescope to view the moons of Mars. One may shop for almost anything at night. Long after well-behaved small town stores are closed, little New York shops carry on their trade in electric washers and radios, in hats, coats and spools of thread.

Because the crowds keep coming the whitecap who turns hot cakes in the window stays on the job. Because people continue to move about even after the last cake has been consumed, the taxicab never goes to bed at all. People who turn cakes elsewhere and pour coffee and fry hot dogs keep at it through the night, since thousands of night laborers all over the city must be fed. The subway still runs to carry them to and from work.

Work Never Ends

Emergency only may arouse the snoring fireman and send him sliding down his brass pole and out on a piece of night work. Emergency only may call the ambulance man into the street and the doctor to the operating room. But thousands of New Yorkers subsist on a regular diet of night employment. There are telephone and telegraph operators, night watchmen and elevator boys. More policemen are needed for the night than for the day, and far more postal clerks.

The closing of the stamp window by no means ends the postoffice's day. With business houses dumping most of their mail in a lump between the hours of 5 and 7, with extensive night letter writing and mailing in the residential districts and with sorting to be done for early morning deliveries, the postoffice estimates that from 60 to 75 per cent. of its work is done at night.

With the spread of evening schools, educating and getting educated laps far over into the night. Printing has long been a twenty-four-hour-a-day job, with night shifts to keep the presses going when all who sleep at night are snugly in bed. Rat-chasing with trained ferrets in spooky cellars goes on only in the solitude of the dark hours.

With the dying notes of the orchestra still in his ears, the returning theatregoer may catch a decidedly daytime sound—the persistent pump, pump of an engine and the shrill whistle of steam. New York even builds at night. White steam clouds puff off into black side streets. Derricks swing out gigantic arms. Trucks rumble up and away and men yell one to another. One more skyscraper is in the making, too eager to be finished to wait for the day.

Foundations particularly demand night work. This is almost always the case if the building site is in the lower part of Manhattan or along the East or Hudson River, where the soil is water soaked and the underground may be kept dry enough for working only by means of compressed air pumped into the caissons in which men labor. To cut the air off at dark and start it again at dawn would multiply foundation digging costs, and so there is let-up only on Sunday. To the men in the shaft it makes no difference whether the sun is shining outside or the moon, and for the men on the surface lights have been specially designed to furnish the properties of daylight and eliminate the shadows of night.

If there is the need for haste in building, the superstructure as well may be worked on at night. It is a common thing for cleaning up to be done at night, also stocking up floors with materials for the morrow. Sometimes even bricklaying is tried after dark, though contractors do not advise it. Night building is considered unwise. It is costly; there is greater chance of accident; the men cannot see well enough to do their best. But these considerations do not always hold in the face of the fact that the renting season is at hand and the building not yet done.

There is hardly a night in New York when men may not be found somewhere with spades and shovels digging and picking in the streets. Night, when traffic grows slack; is the best time to get beneath the pavements and into the tangle of pipes below for repairs. Torn up streets call for night work, too, to lessen the days they must be out of use, and in the case of pressing emergencies there is no such thing for New York as waiting for the morrow.

Ready for Breakfast

Certain early morning requirements of the New Yorker dictate much of the city's night labor. Because tradition holds that the latest news must be read at breakfast, the morning newspaper is printed in the dark hours. Because there must be fresh cream for coffee and because of the distance between the milk depot and the breakfast tables of New York, milk wagons begin before dawn to pick up and carry on the waning noises of the night.

Bread baking is another nocturnal task. It has been so ever since a certain contest between two bakers of seventeenth century France. One of them, it is said, conceived the idea of having bread fresh for breakfast and ordered his men to come at 6 o'clock instead of at 7. His rival then put his men to work at 5 o'clock, the first went him one better, and so on—until Paris was baking all night.

New York's great machine-run bakeries work day and night, but those lesser ones, working only part of the time, hold to night hours. The Finnish bakers are an exception; at 6 o'clock in the evening they fold up their aprons and go home. But it is

A CATTLE MAGNATE SITS IN THE SENATE

Kendrick of Wyoming Applies Efficiency Methods to the Beef Raising Business and Takes the Gamble Out of It

By MALCOLM C. CUTTING

ANY ONE who believes that the day of the big ranch in America is forever gone should pay a visit to Sheridan, Wyo., where John B. Kendrick drops the rôle of United States Senator, when Congress is adjourned, for the more favored one of cattleman.

Here is the O W Ranch, or group of ranches, more than 200,000 acres in extent, half owned and half leased by Senator Kendrick. Here is a breeding herd of eight or ten thousand head of White Face cattle, with cowboys, bronchos, round-ups, and all the settings of the storied days of the open range.

If it were simply a strange survival of the old range, there would be no new story to tell, even though the ranch is owned and operated by a United States Senator. But there is something of interest to the American people in the fact that such a ranch still exists in these days of the cut-up range, that it survived intact the depression of the last six years, and that in management and operation it is a model for other cattlemen to follow.

He Was a Cowboy

Senator Kendrick first saw Wyoming in 1879, when he helped to drive a herd of cattle from Texas to the northern State. He was then 22 years old and in the employ of Charles W. Wulfjen, a Texas drover. Later the young cowboy joined the O W outfit. In 1891 he returned to Texas, his native State, and married Miss Eula Wulfjen, the daughter of his old employer, and by 1898 he had acquired the O W Ranch in the Hanging Woman country, northeast of Sheridan.

In the old days ranching was nothing more than a desperate, if intensely interesting, gamble. There was no investment, except in the cattle themselves, for the land cost nothing, not even taxes. The only expense was the labor cost of rounding up the cattle twice a year, to brand the calves in the Spring, and to sort out the beef animals for market in the Fall. During most of the year, and particularly in the long Winter months, the cattle were expected to rustle for themselves as best they could on the open range.

One of the greatest and one of the most cruel gambles in which man ever engaged was the practice of turning these vast herds of cattle out on the open range in Winter with the certainty of a considerable loss before Spring, and always the probability that a hard Winter would cause a third or a half or three-fourths of the herd to perish.

Often the big outfits would range over a territory 100 miles in length, and would assume that their own range covered 30 or 40 square miles, although possessing no more agrarian right than an unwritten agreement among neighboring ranchers who were availing themselves of a similar privilege.

It was usual for ranches, employing twenty or twenty-five riders in the Summer, to keep no more help than a foreman, a cook and a horse wrangler in Winter, while fifteen or twenty thousand head of cattle roamed the open storm-swept range. Some of the big outfits would maintain Winter "line camps" at the limits of their range, stationing two riders there to keep the cattle, driven before the storms, within their own range.

That was as far as the idea of protection carried—a minimum of protection for the owner, none whatever for the cattle. The ranchmen were gamblers, taking the big risk of loss rather than the expense of protection, and almost always it was a losing game.

These were the conditions, and this was the customary ranch procedure, when Kendrick was moving along the trail from cowboy to ranch owner in the '80s and '90s of the last century. One year, from the O W Ranch, the beef herd was driven to the railroad at Belle Fourche, S. D., 200 miles away. Then the Burlington Railroad penetrated Wyoming and the herd was driven 115 miles to Gillette. Now it is but a few miles from the ranches to the railroad pens.

When John Kendrick first joined the O W outfit it was located on the Running Water Creek, in Eastern Wyoming. Obeying orders from the owners, he moved the herd to the Hanging Woman Creek, in Northern Wyoming and Southern Montana, in 1889. There he put up buildings and corrals on Government land and turned 20,000 head of cattle loose on the open range. Such action was not at all arbitrary or unusual; every one else in the cattle business, from Texas to Montana, was doing the same.

But Kendrick had other ideas of a cattle industry that would endure. He knew that the day of free range must pass and that cattlemen must look to the possession of their range by ownership or lease if they would remain in business. He also knew that cattle on the range must have feed and protection in Winter if ranching was ever to be placed on a business basis.

When he acquired ownership of the O W outfit he began to buy some of the land over which his herds ranged. He bought from State selections of the public domain, from homesteaders who had tried and failed to farm, and from those who had previously purchased sections of reserved land from the Government.

When a settler failed at farming or stock raising to Kendrick it seemed not at all arbitrary or unusual; it was a blessing, but a tragedy. Always he has followed the principle of waiting for the owner to come to him with an offer for the sale or lease of his land. Always, it is said, he has paid for the use of the land more than the taxes due on it, so that no settler has been compelled to have his land sold for taxes.

In 1919, just before deflation struck the cattle industry, Senator Kendrick realized that high prices could not continue, and he sold a large part of his beef herd at profitable figures. Then came deflation, and he would gladly have liquidated his entire herd of cattle and all his ranches if it had been possible to do so.

The cattle could have been sold at bargain-counter figures, but the ranches could not be sold at all. So to protect his investment and make his operations more economical and efficient he was compelled to purchase more land intervening between his current holdings when it was offered for sale to consolidate what he already had.

Senator Kendrick never possessed the ambition to own the largest ranch. But he did have an ambition to own a ranch that was efficiently and satisfactorily managed. From the beginning he believed that the large ranch was not adapted economically to the best development of the West. He was the first man in the Northwest to advocate the enlarged homestead of 640 acres for stock raising in small units, which became a law in the latter days of 1916. He still believes that the future of the cattle industry, in which he has unbounded faith, must be worked out in smaller units than in the past.

Yet today the Senator finds himself, somewhat incongruously, one of the large land owners of the Northwest. It is probable that he owns more than 100,000 acres, and he leases an equal or larger area. With eight or nine thousand breeding cows still in the herd, it is apparent that the days of big ranching are not altogether past.

In the Hanging Woman country, on the Wyoming-Montana border, is the great O W Ranch, with two smaller ranches near by, the L X Bar and the E Bar U. Further north, out of Hardin, Mont., is another large ranch known as the Ceded Strip. In the City of Sheridan, Wyo., where Senator Kendrick has established his home, he has large real estate holdings that he acquired when the city was young.

Blooded Cattle

On one division of the L X Bar is a complete irrigation system of modern type, where alfalfa hay is grown in large quantities for Winter feed. On all the ranches the bottom lands are ditched for gravity irrigation with flood waters. Last Summer 2,500 tons of hay were put up on these ranches, of which 1,000 tons was alfalfa and 1,500 tons was wild hay.

The herd is composed of White Faces, like most of the range cattle of the West, and it is virtually pure bred, having been sired by pure-bred Hereford bulls for more than forty years. In service with this herd are 120 to 150 pure-bred bulls. Twenty new bulls are bought each year from some of the best Hereford breeding establishments in this country to replace the sires that have reached the retirement age.

If a cowman of the old type could visit the Kendrick ranches today he would be surprised by the industry and the orderly business procedure of the outfit. During the Winter the

A WASHINGTON RIDDLE SOLVED AT LAST

Wakefield, His Virginia Birthplace, Was Really a Mansion and Not a Humble Cottage

The Bewdley House, Now Advanced as a Counterpart of Wakefield.

A MAN named Lossing—B. J. Lossing, author and historian—started no end of trouble back in 1851. The ramifications of his deed, no doubt innocently enough if indiscreetly perpetrated, have been extensive. But at last the truth has been dug from a mountain of inaccuracy, myth and supposition. George Washington was not born in a humble farm cottage, but in a substantial mansion. And an approximate copy of this mansion is to be built on the site of the birthplace by the Wakefield National Memorial Association, which has acquired and now owns seventy acres, a part of which is a beautiful wooded bluff overlooking the Potomac, and which includes fifty feet surrounding the graves of the Washingtons.

Thus truth has triumphed. But this triumph is the culmination of a long quest. For many years it was not known just what sort of house it was in which the Father of His Country was born. Popular belief clung to a notion now proved spurious, and here we get back to B. J. Lossing. The source of all the misunderstanding was a drawing by one J. G. Chapman, which Lossing published in his "Field Book of the Revolution" in 1851. It was a drawing made "from memory" some years after the cottage was destroyed. The picture showed a modest little dwelling which, Lossing claimed, was exactly like the house in which George Washington first saw the light of day.

This came to be known as the "Lossing-picture cottage," and readers of the "Field Book" were assured that it very closely approximated the house in which America's first President was born. Its false fame spread. A nation is always interested in the intimate details of its great men's lives. What is more important than the house in which a great man was born? Here was a chance to see the birthplace of a man who had become a demigod. Here was a chance to see the birthplace of a man who had become a demigod. Here was a chance to see the birthplace of a man who had become a demigod.

A Rejected Model

When the idea of constructing a copy of Washington's birthplace was suggested a few years ago it was generally supposed that the Lossing-picture cottage, with its four rooms and attic, a true "primitive," would serve as model. But meanwhile research had been busy, and now the true facts in the case are available.

This year Congress passed a bill giving its sanction to the building of Washington's birthplace on the site that has long been marked by a shaft of granite. Here the Wakefield National Memorial Association proposes to erect a copy of the original house in accordance with the best information available (the house was destroyed by fire in 1779), and to restore as well the Colonial garden and grounds. Mrs. Harry Lee Rust, President of the association, repudiates the Lossing-picture cottage altogether, and in asserting that Washington was born in a mansion her view is in complete accord with that of C. A. Hoppin, a genealogical student of high standing who has spent years delving into the property and was one of the primitive farmhouses of Virginia. Its roof was steep and sloped down into low-projecting eaves. It had four rooms on the ground floor, and others in the attic, and an immense chimney at each end. Not a vestige of it remains."

So far so good. It is a novelist's description of a drawing done from memory and enables the reader to visualize the place precisely. There was no longer any doubt in people's minds that this house of the Lossing picture was just like the birthplace of the Father of His Country—Wakefield, in Westmoreland County, Va. Here George Washington had lived until 16 years of age; in a four-room cottage, "one of the primitive farmhouses of Virginia."

The Cottage Drawn by Lossing, Long Thought to Be an Accurate Copy of Wakefield.

replica of the very house—at least so Mr. Lossing said.

Along came Washington Irving, and he said so, too. To be sure. The drawing published in Lossing's "Field Book" was an accurate representation of the house at Wakefield in which George Washington was born. The novelist, writing his "Life of George Washington," observes:

"George * * * was born * * * in the homestead on Bridges Creek. This house commanded a view over many miles of the Potomac. * * * It had probably been purchased with the property and was one of the primitive farmhouses of Virginia. Its roof was steep and sloped down into low-projecting eaves. It had four rooms on the ground floor, and others in the attic, and an immense chimney at each end. Not a vestige of it remains."

A. Hoppin, a genealogical student of high standing who has spent years delving into

Mr. Hoppin has acquired the arduous but, for his profession, the invaluable habit of spending weeks and months poring over musty old records in court houses. He, too, emphatically says that the Lossing-picture cottage does not at all represent the house long believed to have been Washington's birthplace. To construct now anything less than a copy of a fine old Virginia mansion would never do if the Washingtons "who mas- that mansion what it was and lived in it as gentlemen of means, culture and ability," are not to be belittled.

So an ancient riddle is solved.

Away, then, with the Chapman picture lovingly sponsored by B. J. Lossing, Esq. Away with all notions of reproducing primitive Virginia farmhouses reared in semi-wilderness. What is conjured instead is a "mansion" containing from ten to a dozen rooms—the sort of house a wealthy Colonial farmer would provide for the comfort of himself and his family.

Mr. Hoppin's findings do not, however, rest alone upon a law of "fitness." They contain, for one thing, an inventory of household goods representing the contents of Wakefield House before it was burned in 1780; a list so long that, as he observes with a smile to the interviewer, "it would fill three columns of your newspaper." Not even the forthcoming issue of Tyler's Quarterly Historical and Genealogical Magazine has space for the entire inventory. But outstanding items may be indicated here. According to Colonel Augustine Washington Jr.'s inventory, the house at Wakefield numbered among its equipment nine beds with their furnishings, eight bed carpets, fifty-one chairs, mostly of mahogany and black walnut, and fourteen tables.

Mr. Hoppin's long list is humorously complete, including a shaving outfit, a fiddle, some miscellaneous bolts of cloth and a silver mounted gun. But it is, of course, upon the more bulky objects that his argument rests. How, he asks, could nine beds, fifty-one chairs and fourteen tables be comfortably disposed in a four-room cottage, such as that pictured in the Lossing book and religiously accepted by generation after generation as being exactly like Wakefield?

It is well to keep the situation clear in one's mind. There actually was a Lossing cottage. Like Wakefield, too, it burned—as so many of the Colonial houses did—leaving only memories. Chapman, the artist, had seen this little house, which stood in the general vicinity of George Washington's habitat, and had come to be known as a replica of the house in which Washington was born. But that Washington never lived in it, Mr. Hoppin is fully prepared to show.

"Judged," he says, "by the extant old houses of Northern Virginia of the seventeenth century the cottage opposite Fredericksburg was not a house typical of the residences of wealthy gentlemen of that period. It was inferior in size, style and character—merely a 'farmhouse of small size, sufficient for the needs of a farmer or of a widow living largely alone.'" Wakefield was another thing altogether.

"The late Laurence Washington, direct descendant of Samuel, the full brother of George Washington, resided for many years on land adjoining Mount Vernon," continues Mr. Hoppin. "He was librarian of the House of Representatives at Washington and formed the Washingtonia collection now arranged in the 'Washington Alcove' in the Library of Congress. In 1918 I asked him: 'Was the house called Wakefield, on Pope's Creek, like the cottage on the Rappahannock pictured by Lossing?' To this question he replied: 'No. Wakefield was a larger house, and of two stories.'"

Attitude of the Family

A few months ago Mr. Hoppin received a letter from William Lanier Washington that bears strongly on the subject. William Lanier Washington is the great-greatgrandson of William Augustine Washington, nephew of George Washington, and last owner and occupant of Wakefield. After explaining that the name "Wakefield" was not used in George Washington's day but seems to have been given to the house at a later period, this descendant says that his father received accurate information about the house from William Lanier Washington's great grandfather. These paragraphs in his letter to Mr. Hoppin may be quoted:

"My father was 15 years old when his grandfather, George Corbin Washington, died. He had passed much of his time with his grandfather, who told my father that Wakefield was not the small, cottage-like house that it is generally represented to have been, but that it was a house of probably a dozen or more rooms, on two floors, such as a man of Augustine Washington Sr.'s position and wealth would provide for a family of several sons and a daughter. [Augustine Washington Sr., father of George Washington, had ten children.]

"The house of Wakefield was destroyed on Christmas Day of the year 1780 by a fire that started while

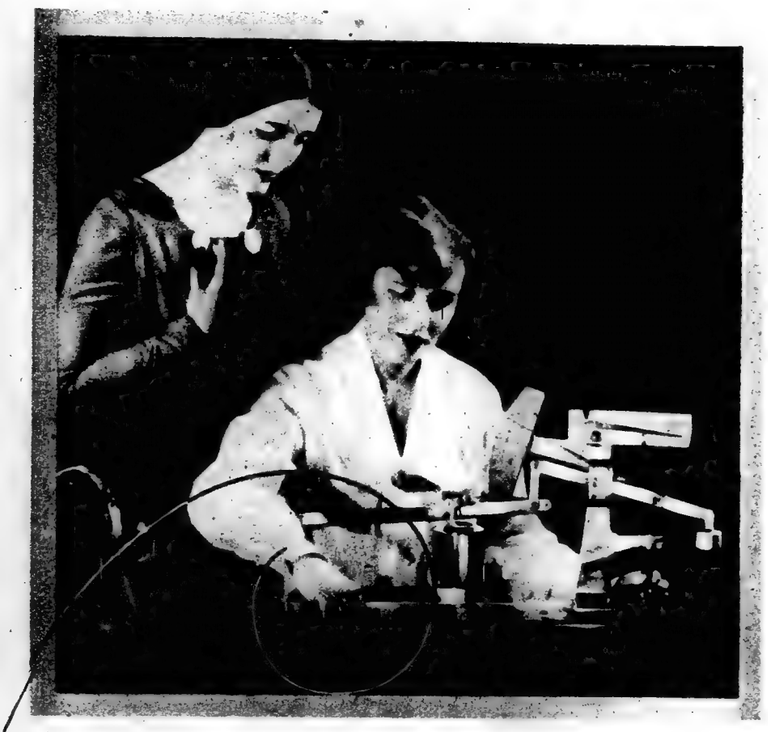
Amazing Progress in Permanent Waving



A hair test on the Nestle Text-o-meter

Only those hairdressers who have been graduated from a special course in the use of the Text-o-meter in the Nestle Institute of Hair Science are licensed to use it

Mr.* Charles Nestle's latest discoveries void many previously accepted principles of Permanent Waving

MR. *Charles Nestle, the inventor of permanent waving, had long known (even if experience had not proven it so) that one inflexible process of permanent waving—no matter how perfect on some heads—must be imperfect on others.

He knew that there was variation in hair structure. But to find that variation, to determine what it was—to that cause he devoted 20 years of unending research.

* * * *

Now, he announces its solution in a startling paper that has earned its place in universities, in colleges, in libraries nation-wide. It represents the greatest discovery ever made in the science of hair research.

Strange as it may seem, he definitely proves that differences in hair structure, so important in permanent waving, are in no way related to the color of the hair, to its dryness or oiliness, to its fineness or coarseness—that the one vital factor in giving a perfect permanent wave is the absorption quality of the hair itself.

How simple that is to understand, once we know it!

But how to determine the absorption quality of a given head of hair—how to register it just as accurately as an oculist determines the strength or weakness of a given pair of eyes—this Mr. Nestle has accomplished in the invention of the Text-o-meter—the ingenious machine you see illustrated here. It requires only a small sample of your own hair (5 inches long and no thicker than a pin) for testing.

Your Hair Tested as You Watch!

Now, by the efficient use of the Text-o-meter, in but a few minutes time, your hairdresser will determine the absorption quality of your hair, placing it into one of the ten classes in which Mr. Nestle has divided all human hair of our race. For these ten classes he has made ten Circulines—one for each class.

It is this Circuline, with the help of clear, fresh water, that, applied to your hair with but seven minutes of temperate heat, causes the reshaping of the hair cells, so that your hair waves as beautifully, as naturally, as though Nature herself had waved it!

Our interesting booklet describing NESTLE CIRCULINE will be sent you without charge.

EXPERIENCE THIS SIMPLE TEST YOURSELF

If your hairdresser is not a licensed Text-o-meter hairdresser, then send a small hair sample (5 inches long and no thicker than a pin) to the Nestle laboratories at 12 East 49th Street, enclosing $1.00 for hair test and classification. Or if you can call personally at either of the two Nestle Establishments listed below, a free test will be made while you wait. 12 East 49th Street; 1650 Broadway, corner 51st Street.

Are two permanents better than one?

¶ No! . . . . . It is needless to re-wave the already waved ends of your hair, merely because new straight hair has begun to grow.

¶ Go to a Eugène Waver and get a Selective Permanent Wave . . a new wave for the new hair only . . leaving the previously waved hair unchanged.

¶ This Selective Waving is an exclusive feature of the Eugène Method . . . . . with its Two-Sectional Steamers and Re-wave Sachets. . . .

¶ The Eugène Method is the perfected way of permanent waving . . . . It does not drench the hair in strong solutions, and then bake it dry . . . . Instead, the Eugène Waver winds the hair dry, then waves it with tiny jets of clean white steam under precise control, until it assumes the natural, wide undulations of the vogue.

¶ It is significant that despite its slightly higher cost, the finest shops of England, the Continent and America use the Eugène Method. Our book, "The Eugene Method" will tell you why. (List of accredited Eugène Wavers included on request.)

WATCH YOUR THROAT!

The warning signal

MORE serious illnesses than you can count on the fingers of both hands start with the warning signal, an irritated throat.

A tickle in your throat is nature's way of saying "Look out—Danger ahead: the bacteria are getting the upper hand!" Naturally, too, because the throat is the open door for infection. It is the ideal breeding place for disease germs.

And in spite of this, so many of us neglect throat protection! A good, healthy body will be able to throw off the attacks of many bacteria, but very often the human system is not in the proper condition to fight them back.

When you think of your throat in this way, it seems amazing that more people do not take the proper precaution against illnesses that start with throat infection. Particularly, when the safe antiseptic, Listerine, is as near at hand as any corner drug store.

Be on the safe side these winter days. Use Listerine regularly as a mouth wash and gargle. Also, then, you will be on the polite side with regard to that insidious condition, halitosis (unpleasant breath).—Lambert Pharmacal Company, St. Louis, U. S. A.

What can I give her this year for Christmas?

A CHERISHED gift—if it is a La Cross manicure set—for its beauty of design and workmanship and its durable and expertly made implements.

Every detail in the manufacture of these fine manicure instruments is painstakingly employed to produce the best that can be made. The file has sharp regular teeth with smooth edges to protect the finger tips. The scissors are specially hardened and tempered and do not spring or bend apart.

Fascinating white, blue or pink pearloid handles are beautifully wrought. There are handles to match popular toilet sets too. Cases are of soft, genuine, fine-grained leather and lined with rich stain in the newest shades. La Cross sets have lasting beauty and usefulness. Prices range from $1.50 to $25. For sale at gift shops, drug and department stores. All manicure sets and implements are unqualifiedly guaranteed. Schnefel Brothers, Inc., Newark, N. J.

AS THE HOLIDAYS LOOM ON THE THEATRICAL HORIZON

FROM NOVEL TO PLAY

"The Constant Nymph" Adapted for Dramatic Expression—Wild, Rebellious Spirits of the Tyrol

By J. BROOKS ATKINSON.

NOW that the drama is gradually escaping the tyranny of the well-made play we are beginning to have more productions whose value in the theatre depends largely upon direction, as in "Broadway" and "The Constant Nymph" of the current season. No one would be arrogant enough to dismiss the well-made play as an outworn form of dramatic composition. In the process of development it brought the theatre out of fairyland into the world; and "Daisy Mayme" and "The Captive" prove every evening, it is still the most effective treatment for many available themes. Like the heroic couplet, however, that kept poetry thoroughly formal and intellectual in the eighteenth century, the well-made play is too rigid to express the multiplicity of human life—the color, the swing and the gusto, the medley of impressions through which we pass day after day. To capture those overtones and undertones that redeem life from monotony, that add pleasure and pain to the phlegm of mere existence, we need more versatile forms of dramatic production—as versatile, in fact, as Shakespearean theatre.

In the direction of "The Constant Nymph," quite as much as in the fine adaptation from Miss Kennedy's romantic novel, Mr. Dean has conveyed the fullness of the life depicted in those inspired pages. For "The Constant Nymph" is more than the tale of a strange, sombre love between a genius and an abnormally pure maiden of the mountain-tops. That predetermined attachment is the dominating unity, the brightest thread running through the crazy-quilt pattern of the production. The play does not begin to cohere until it leaves Lewis and Tessa alone on the stage; and the conclusion, with Lewis and Tessa at last brought together face to face, is the true climax of the fable. But perhaps like Lewis's startling "Symphony in Three Keys" (which is the only one we never hear), the story has many voices, many instruments—harmony as well as harps; the shadows are deep in contrast with the high lights and the pathos is tempered with comedy. Through many ingenious transitions, the play runs from high comedy to warm romance, from jest to cruelty, from bitter satire to lovemaking under the stars.

What a mad scramble of ill-assorted human beings! How eccentric and capricious their destinies! Mr. Dean has divided his twenty-four persons between characters, like Tessa, Lewis and Florence, and broad types, like the preposterous people who drift into Florence's stiff musicale; and he has stirred them up into a scattered, performance that is sometimes deliciously broad in its horseplay. Nothing is more amusing than the dinner eaten in Sanger's Circus on the mountaintop with a clatter of plates, a brisk mixing of condiments, a constant ratter of insulting remarks and a general exhibition of bad manners, horrible to behold. As Sanger's present mistress, Miss Warring-Manley sweeps and leers and bangles her accent and indulges in the most brassen "insinuendoes" about every other inmate in the cottage.

FOR all this comic bravura, "The Constant Nymph" is a sincerely moving production in the minor strain of pathos. The children make it so, and particularly the Paulina acted by Miss Chandler and the Tessa by Miss Thomson. Through all the frantic and badly managed affairs of their elders these little girls scamper like wood nymphs, giggling and burrowing without responsibility, yet curiously intuitive about all that is going on. Even before Lewis had declared his love to Florence they understand his state of mind and they suspect like a flash the fatal consciousness of such a union.

One is constantly touched by the pathetic helplessness of their position. As Tessa Miss Thomson suffuses her part with the soft loveliness of a girl who is old by instinct for her years. From the beginning Tessa understood Lewis far better than he did himself, and when he brutally tore apart the finely spun world of her dreams by marrying Florence, she saw the future clearly. She knew that he could never repair that wrong and that it was she who would suffer most intensely, for she alone had read the message of the child. This is not a real character; it is a sublimation of the innocent wisdom of childhood. Miss Thomson plays it in that vein. And one realizes in Tessa's release by death from the clumsiness, from the bruising of further worldly living.

AFTER the opening performance such a din of critical discord flew angrily into the heavens as never before made night hideous along Broadway. Comment ran all the way from soulful, tender panegyrics softened with tears to mordant abuse from red-hot pens. "The Constant Nymph," it seemed, had been vilely traduced; the sympathies of the novel corrupted beyond redemption. Letters to the press have scorched the postman's fingers and charred the tops of the editorial desks. On the placid stationery of the Sunwise Turn bookshop, pleasantly ensconced in the Yale Club building, Mary Mowbray-Clarke separates hawks from handsaws feverishly and displays an anxious concern for the future of American culture—

This play is about a man named Lewis Dodd much more than it is about any one else. The importance of him to us is surely greater than the importance of Tessa or Florence. The works of the musician and the artist in general do form our civilization. They are the culture, at least, within which what might some day be civilization again could be wrought. So it is most important to see the Lewis Dodds clearly, for we know them but dimly. We know only about their love affairs which the newspapers make into commonplace scandals. Lewis in the play MS. is remarkably done and could have been really played by Rollo Peters, who would not even have had to struggle for an "accent"—as Americans invariably say when referring to English speech—a minor superiority but a significant one. Peters is bred-in-the-bone artist and the Kinderhut would have been no strange domicile for him. He is the only man I can think of who could have played the part as it was written.

Is it too late to get this play a real chance? Anders hasn't the knowledge, experience, or temperament for it, and the play really is Lewis Dodd's in spite of its name and its fair and devoted studies of all the women. Actually a chance to see a good production of "The Constant Nymph" would help make America civilized enough to abrogate the nineteenth amendment!

Such a state of affairs! When Margaret Kennedy chose "The Constant Nymph" as the rubric for her novel she appeared to be thinking not of Lewis but of Tessa; many of us have been stupidly led astray by the title. Elsewhere in her letter Mrs. Mowbray-Clarke goes straight to the heart of the matter: "A curiously woman-ridden creature the American male is! He lacks completely every vestige of interest, either emotional or scientific, in serious presentations of members of his sex who sum up the significant powers of the race by being geniuses, and in every play or story centres his interest on the woman, however immature and limited."

Man is coarse and Man is plain—
Man is more or less insane—
Man's a ribald—Man's a rake,
Man is Nature's sole mistake!

AS Mr. Anderson remarked caustically in The Evening Post, those who see the play would do well to pitch the novel out of the window. For sometimes, even in plays as distinguished from adaptations, the finished product is quite different from what the author intended. When M. Bourdet wrote "The Captive," for instance, he considered the sufferings of Jacques more essential than the tragedy of Irène. But the part of Irène acts so much better in the theatre that the play has become a study of her dark tribulations. Adaptations that communicate the precise spirit of novels are doubtless the novelists' ideal; but adaptations impregnated with the vivid life of the theatre are more essential to the playgoer.

None of the recent adaptations pulsates with the dramatic vitality of "The Constant Nymph" as a play in its own right. Surely "An American Tragedy" plays fast and loose with all credible dramatic form; "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes," based upon a series of vaguely connected episodes, makes no pretense to plot, development or orderly movement. "The Constant Nymph" violates the novel in many respects—even in characterization—but it stands upon its own feet as drama. After one thoroughly disconcerting scene, which is neither fish, flesh, foul nor good red herring, it develops its story quietly from the romantic chaos of Sanger's absurd circus of illegitimate children and hangers-on to the interlude between Lewis and Tessa in the final scene. Away from disorder it travels to the simplest of unities, to a disarming consolation for all the painful conflicts of the play.

WHAT is the precious metal in this composition? Not the study of a musical genius nor the apostrophization of childhood, but the romance of wild, rebellious spirits native to a Tyrol mountain top. They do not live like the common folk of the plains. Their standards are not moral, practical nor intelligent; they are not to be disciplined. They are as free and as beautiful as the birds that swing over the Tyrol pastures. You cannot teach them manners. Only Antonia flourishes amid the life of the city streets; she is the one plebeian in the Sanger cavalcade.

As Lewis Dodd, Mr. Anders is too mocking, too light-hearted; this composer should be a brooding, snarling, malevolent spirit with a broader range of emotions than Mr. Anders describes. As the representative of respectability, Miss Robb retains a fine dignity in the humiliating scenes of her disastrous musicale and Lewis's flight from England. The performance, long, episodic and frequently prolix, weaves the absurdities, the bold contrasts, the caricatures and the tenderness into a bizarre pattern of romance. The pace is sometimes brisk and sometimes slow. The source of "The Constant Nymph" is literature; its expression on the stage, however, is pure theatre.

The Gifted Beatrice Lillie, Who Comes to Town at the Fulton Tuesday Night as the Star of a Musical Comedy Bearing the Title of "Oh, Please!"

ON THE PARIS STAGE—TWO NEW PRODUCTIONS

PARIS, Dec. 3.

THE Théâtre des Jeunes Auteurs, which revealed several interesting plays last year, has begun its second season by staging, at the Odéon, Jean-Richard Bloch's "history" in thirteen scenes, "Le Dernier Empereur," the text of which has been printed in the periodical Europe. This vast dramatic fresco, which is the author's first play, had previously been accepted for production by Gémier at the Théâtre Populaire and by Copeau at the Vieux-Colombier. It is a political play. It might be described as the Calvary of a young monarch whose democratic leanings and liberal reforms, eyed with suspicion by the friends he once had in radical circles, are also opposed by a reactionary and unscrupulous Chancellor who does not hesitate to precipitate a threat of war. The Chancellor is killed by the pacifists. The young Emperor leaves his palace. A bellicist kills his bosom friend—the Horatio of this new Hamlet, who wanders away in solitude, powerless before human selfishness.

The plot is more complicated and more burdened with detail than the foregoing outline indicates; indeed, the author, hitherto known as a novelist, has a tendency to overload his canvas. His play, which lasts four hours, comprises thirty-three personages and innumerable "supers." A "unanimist" of the Jules Romains school, Jean-Richard Bloch is especially skillful in his handling of human crowds, and he has treated a subject of almost Shakespearian magnitude with exceptional ability and effectiveness. There is real grandeur in the scene of the Cabinet meeting in which the question of war is discussed and which, in its passionate eloquence, recalls the accents of Mark Antony over the dead Caesar. On the whole, "Le Dernier Empereur," which will be included in the repertory of the Odéon, is a play of great promise. Although very poorly mounted, it has been well directed by Armand Bour.

Mme. Sylvie (now replaced by Mlle. Alice Dufrène in the part of Irène in Edouard Bourdet's "The Captive" at the Théâtre Fémina) is starring as Dr. Farel (whose first name is also Irène) in André Pascal and Pierre Delbet's "La Vocation," which has just opened at the Renaissance. André Pascal is the pen-name of Baron Henri de Rothschild, M. D., and Professor Delbet of the Faculty of Medicine is one of the leading French surgeons. The new piece was therefore bound to deal with the medical profession, already studied by Pascal in his previous play, "Le Caducée." The first half of "La Vocation" (which is in four acts) is a critique of feminism; the authors maintain that a woman cannot have both a home and a career. The play is tragic. Dr. Irène Farel—who retains her maiden name—is married to François Mareuil, a playwright of note. She pays more attention to her patients than to her husband and their daughter, a child of 8. Professor Gerbier, Dr. Farel's master and the authors' spokesman, delivers himself of various aphorisms which reveal the gist of the first two acts: "A woman doctor is a stranger who, day and night, saves the lives of others, not seeing that death is lurking in her home"; "When a woman takes up a man's profession she probably retains what is worse in either sex" and "The child of a woman doctor is an orphan on his mother's side." Original truths, as one can see. The latter half of the play is taken up with a problem of feminine psychology. Being on night duty, Dr. Farel is summoned by the Police Commissioner of the quarter to the bedside of an unknown patient, an actress, and finds herself face to face with her husband, whose mistress the lady is. She saves the actress, but, hurt in her pride by her husband's infidelity, she determines to divorce him, and, in addition, revenge herself by making him doubt his paternity of their child. Why she tells this fiendish and utterly groundless lie is not made clear by the authors, who in the previous acts have not pictured Irène as particularly cruel, nor even as particularly amorous. Anyhow, the doubt so preys on François's reason that (it is now 11:45 P. M. and the play must end) he shoots himself in a fit of melancholy.

It is considered very Parisian to pooh-pooh the plays of André Pascal because he happens to be a very wealthy amateur playwright. I do not agree. The wealth of an author has nothing to do with his talent. If he is wealthy, so much the better: his plays are well mounted. Were Jean-Richard Bloch a wealthy man, "Le Dernier Empereur" would have been as well mounted as "La Vocation," which, with its shortcomings, is an interesting and forceful play, abounding in striking situations and extremely well acted by Mme. Sylvie, M. Constant-Rémy and M. Vargas in the leading rôles.

To commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the death of George Sand, the Comédie Française has revived her "Le Mariage de Victorine," which is a sequel to Sedaine's "Le Philosophe sans le Savoir." There is plenty of uproarious fun in the new offering at the Eldorado, "Epinard gagne le Grand Steeple," a very wild farce by Pierre Veber, Maurice Dekobra and André Heuzé. It deals with the race course, or, to be more precise, with the adventures of a café proprietor who is also a hearse driver in the service of a company of undertakers and who inherits a race horse. Marcel Simon, undoubtedly the most comical actor on the French stage, is irresistibly funny in the principal part.

Owing to lack of space, I can only mention the very fine performance of Euripides's "Medea" given at the Comédie des Champs-Elysées by the "Slavic Duse," Mme. Guermanova, and her company from the Moscow Art Theatre (Prague group).

Despite its adverse press notices, the Donnay-Duvernois revue (reviewed in my article of Nov. 21) is making money at the Porte Saint-Martin, which indicates either that—as is perfectly likely—newspaper criticisms have no influence on the public at large, or—as is more probable—that the people who flock to hear Huguette Duflos and Maurice Escande of the Comédie Française sing or recite in a music hall show go there with the mentality of the Englishmen in Savoir's play who followed a traveling circus everywhere with the hope of seeing the tamer devoured by the lion.

MAURICE BOUDOUSSOIS.

THE WEEK'S OPENINGS

THE SILVER CORD—Tomorrow night at the John Golden Theatre. The Theatre Guild's production of a play by Sidney Howard, scheduled to alternate weekly with "Ned McCobb's Daughter," also by Mr. Howard. The players will include Laura Hope Crews, Elisabeth Risdon, Margalo Gillmore, Earle Larrimore and Eliot Cabot.

TWELFTH NIGHT— Tomorrow night at the Civic Repertory Theatre. Eva Le Gallienne and her company, in their first Shakespearean production. Eva Le Gallienne will be the Viola, Beatrice Terry the Olivia and Sayre Crawley the Malvolio.

THE ETERNAL JEW—Tomorrow night at the Mansfield Theatre. The second offering of the Moscow Theatre Habima. It will be the program for the full week.

OH, PLEASE!—Tuesday night at the Fulton Theatre. Beatrice Lillie, none other, as the star of a musical show written—in the beginning, at least—by Anne Caldwell and Otto Harbach, with tunes by Vincent Youmans. In addition to Miss Lillie, the players will include Charles Winninger, Charles Purcell, Helen Broderick and Nick Long Jr.

THE GREAT ADVENTURE—Wednesday night at the Princess Theatre. A revival of Arnold Bennett's comedy, first acted here about ten years ago. Reginald Pole, prominent in the Western art theatres, will have the principal rôle.

TONY SARG'S MARIONETTES—Wednesday night at the Edyth Totten Theatre. The annual holiday appearance of Mr. Sarg's puppets, this time in "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves." The première will be an evening affair; thereafter there will be no night performances—only daily matinees at 3, with morning performances (at 11 A. M.) on Dec. 25 and Jan. 1.

THE HONOR OF THE FAMILY—Saturday night at the Booth Theatre. Mr. Skinner again as the swaggering Colonel Bridau—a rôle and a play that Mr. Skinner has revived on several occasions. The play, as may be remembered, derives from Balzac.

NEW YORK EXCHANGE—Saturday night at the Klaw Theatre. A play, it is said, about certain sordid aspects of life in the metropolis, the work of one Peter Glenney. Among its players will be Alison Skipworth and Miss Sidney Shields.

OTHER EVENTS

RUTH DRAPER—Tonight at the Selwyn Theatre.

CECILE SOREL—Final week at the Cosmopolitan Theatre. Tomorrow and Thursday, "L'Aventurière"; Wednesday matinee and evening, "Le Demi Monde"; Tuesday, "La Dame Aux Camelias"; Friday and Saturday, "Maîtresse de Roi"; Saturday matinee, "Le Misanthrope."

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE—At the 14th St. Theatre. Tuesday, Wednesday matinee, Friday and Saturday, "Twelfth Night"; Wednesday, "John Gabriel Borkman"; Thursday, "La Locandiera"; Saturday matinee, "La Locandiera."

"PRINCESS TURANDOT," recently seen at the Provincetown Playhouse, will reopen tomorrow night at the Greenwich Village Theatre.

GOSSIP OF THE RIALTO

Miss Cowl in a Play by Mr. Sherwood—E. H. Sothern at the Lyceum Next Week—Players in "The Brothers Karamazov"

AND now it seems that Robert E. Sherwood has written a play. Mr. Sherwood, in addition to his editorial duties on Life, finds time to see all the current motion pictures in the course of being a film critic, and even to write a few scenarios himself. Now, doubtless in taxicabs between movie houses, Mr. Sherwood has written a play. Moreover, Jane Cowl will be the star of it, and it is entitled "The Road to Rome." Further news is that rehearsals will begin tomorrow, and Philip Merivale will have the principal male rôle.

"Lily Sue" seems to be somewhat less successful than its early patronage indicated, and will accordingly be withdrawn from the Lyceum this week. The next production at the Lyceum will likewise be the offering of Mr. Belasco—the play entitled "What Never Dies," with Mr. Sothern as its star. It seems to have been greeted with favor on the road, and so has Haidee Wright, who appears to have one of those rôles that come to an actress once in a lifetime. The play, adapted by Ernest Boyd, is from the German. If Mr. Belasco follows his custom of Tuesday premieres, it will open at the Lyceum on Dec. 28.

The Theatre Guild will use half a dozen of its mainstays in its forthcoming production of "The Brothers Karamazov." The cast will include Lynn Fontanne, Clare Eames, Alfred Lunt, Dudley Digges, Edward G. Robinson and Henry Travers, among the regulars, with George Gaul thrown in for good measure. The plan, it will be recalled, will have this play alternating weekly with "Pygmalion" at the Guild, while Sidney Howard's two plays take turns at the John Golden. Of the players named above, the first half dozen are likewise occupied in either "Pygmalion" or "Ned McCobb's Daughter."

The operetta, "The Lace Petticoat," is apparently of promise, for it will open a week hence at a theatre unspecified when these notes were compiled.

The list of Christmas premieres as it stands at this moment is as follows:

The Guitrys in "Mozart." Monday at the 46th Street Theatre. Unquestionably the outstanding event of the week, even if the opening night price were not $27.50.

"Peggy Ann," a musical show with Helen Ford in its leading rôle. Written by the ascendant Rodgers-Fields-Hart trio. Monday at the Vanderbilt.

"The Lace Petticoat," as noted above.

"Wooden Kimono," a mystery play that the road says is good. Monday at the Martin Beck.

"The Black Cockatoo," of which not a lot is known just at the moment. Monday, possibly at the Comedy.

The third production of the Habima troupe, probably "The Golem." Monday at the Mansfield.

"Sam Abramovitch," an Anne Nichols production with some fifty people in the cast. The theatre is not yet named, but Miss Nichols has enough money to buy any theatre she wants, so there is no doubt about the opening.

"What Never Dies." Tuesday at the Lyceum, as set down above.

"Betsy," the first Ziegfeld show in a long time. Tuesday at the New Amsterdam. Belle Baker and plenty of others.

"In Abraham's Bosom," down in Macdougal Street. Tuesday at the Provincetown.

Sudden, at times, are the decisions of the theatre. James Cagney, remembered here for his performance in "Outside Looking In," had been scheduled for the leading rôle in the London "Broadway" company, and remained so scheduled until about twelve hours before the time set for his departure for England. The company sailed on the Majestic a week ago yesterday; on the preceding Thursday afternoon, at the Broadhurst, there was a dress rehearsal. It was at this rehearsal that the management decided that Mr. Cagney, after all, was not perfectly suited to the part. On the following night Lee Tracy was given a night off while his understudy, an actor named Roy Lloyd, gave an exhibition performance in the part. The result was the substitution of Mr. Lloyd for Mr. Cagney on the steamship Majestic, although Mr. Cagney's trunks were already in the stateroom. One or two of them, incidentally, went right on over to England.

As has been set down during the week in the daily news columns, a revue impends with book by Ben Hecht and score by Roger Wolfe Kahn. In the news columns it was Mr. Kahn's score that was the important item, but on this page the fact that Mr. Hecht is writing a libretto rather outweighs Mr. Kahn's participation. That young gentleman, after all, has written tunes before, but Mr. Hecht is new as a librettist. The revue will be produced by Horace Liveright—not in Greenwich Village, as the first accounts had it, but in what is known as a regular Broadway theatre. It will be a revue with a connecting story, and, in the words of Mr. Liveright, it will "aim to get under the skin of American life."

A pair of mysterious musical shows have bobbed up in the hinterland. One of them, called "Merry Ann," is advertised in the Detroit papers for presentation during the coming week; the other, named "Listen, Desire," will open in Atlantic City a week hence. In all New York none could be found to shed any light. . . . But, to be sure, not all of the American theatre derives from New York.

"Chicago" is scheduled to open in Atlantic City tomorrow night, with Francine Larrimore in its leading rôle, instead of Jeanne Eagels. Miss Larrimore was signed for the part only nine days ago, and in the interim has given eleven performances of "This Was a Man." In the circumstances here was a difficult task of preparation and a postponement of the opening is not inconceivable.

Apparently the play called "Creoles"—there seems to have been a good deal about "Creoles" in these columns recently—is not coming too immediately to New York. At all events, Richard Bennett, who lately acted the play on the coast, is staying out there to act "They Knew What They Wanted" and "The Dove." In the latter, of course, he will play the rôle that was Hedbrink Ellim's.

The Chariot players that Mr. Carroll is bringing over will include Herbert Mundin, and that fact should provide a pleasurable Sunday in not a few American homes. Another in the company will be Jessie Matthews. Miss Matthews was but a minor member of the troupe when the first Charlot revue was seen here, but, subsequently, on the road, she played Gertrude Lawrence's rôles with a good deal of success. More recently she has scored a great hit in London and is now regarded as a Charlot star.

Shows are so scarce in Chicago that "Abie's Irish Rose" and "No, No, Nanette" are both playing return engagements out there. . . . Eleanor Painter joined "The Nightingale" in Philadelphia last night. The show comes to Jolson's on Jan. 2. . . . Albert Lewis is again making preparations to produce "The Spider," a mystery play announced earlier in the season. Lowell Brentano and Fulton Oursler are the authors. . . . Lee Carrillo's show, "A Rough Diamond," will open in Boston a week hence, which means that the New York engagement is still unfixed.

The play called "Crime," by the Messrs. Shipman and Hymer, will be put into rehearsal in two weeks by Mr. Woods, probably with Lowell Sherman as its star. With that play launched Mr. Woods is likely to turn his attention to "The Garden of Eden." Jeanne Eagels, who dropped this play to act "Chicago," is now free to do the other one again. Provided she wants to, of course, and that Mr. Woods is likewise willing.

Florence Eldridge is a recent addition to the cast of "Few Can Do It," for which John Halliday and Lucile Watson have already been named. The play will open in Philadelphia on Jan. 10 and probably in New York two weeks later. It is the work of Arthur Caesar, brother of Irving Caesar, the librettist and lyric writer.

"Behind Lace Curtains," the play known in England as "Distinguished Villa," closed on the road a week or so ago. The final act, it is said, requires revision. In the meantime plans for further production await the revised script.

Allan Dinehart and Claiborne Foster are presently to act together in a play by Milton Herbert Gropper, who wrote "Ladies of the Evening" and half of "We Americans." Mr. Herndon will be the producer. . . . The Sam Bernard show, now called "Piggy," will open next Saturday night at Werba's Brooklyn Theatre, and will remain there the following week. Further plans are undecided; even though the show should then be ready for the metropolis, the theatre is not. The production has been announced as the opening attraction at one of the new Chanin houses, and a trip through Forty-fourth Street discloses that the three pending Chanin houses are as yet far from complete.

Evelyn Herbert, last seen and heard here in "Princess Flavia," will have the title rôle in the Shuberts' forthcoming musical show, "Barbara Frietchie." After that the Shuberts will start work on a Continental operetta called "The Circus Princess."

Mr. Ames, having tapped a rich vein with his Gilbert & Sullivan productions, is planning to start rehearsals of "The Gondoliers" along about Feb. 1. This would fix the production date as the second week of March, at which time as matters stand at present "The Pirates of Penzance" will hardly have begun to exhaust its popularity. Apparently, however, Mr. Ames is desirous of offering a fresh production in the Spring so as to be assured of

PLAYS AND PLAYERS HEREABOUTS—GERMAN THEATRES

Who's Who On the Stage

CARLTON BRICKERT, who portrays the much-put-upon Cliff Mattinger in George Kelly's comedy, "Daisy Mayme," at the Playhouse, has, it seems, had his days and nights upset recently through an unwanted complication insinuating itself into his usually placid existence.

Mr. Brickert has a contract with Robert McLaughlin, remembered, though hazily, as the author of "The Pearl of Great Price," to appear in stock for ten weeks each Summer at McLaughlin's Ohio Theatre, Cleveland. He originally entered into this contract as insurance against the usual Summer lay-off and in order to enjoy the benefits of essaying the variety of rôles that such an engagement affords. But instead of proving a source of comfort during the usually inactive period of the average player's life, the agreement has turned out to be more a hindrance than a help.

After the first season of this contract with Mr. McLaughlin, Mr. Brickert was acting the leading rôle of "White Cargo" when the call to Cleveland demanded his withdrawal from the cast. He returned to New York early in the Fall; the play he had been forced to desert was still running, and there were no prospects in sight for an immediate engagement.

He went through the season that followed on the road as leading man for Nance O'Neil. After the inevitable stock engagement he played with Lenore Ulric in "Kiki," when again Mr. McLaughlin's long arm reached out from the Ohio city and bore him from a lucrative engagement.

Of course, this agreement has not always worked adversely. During its life it has proved an oasis in several arid seasons. Notwithstanding that it is only December, Mr. Brickert even now is threatened with the possibility of having to leave the cast of "Daisy Mayme." He is, therefore, already laying plans to persuade Mr. McLaughlin to permit him to enjoy such an engagement as a run of the play contract assures.

The Rise of Miss Mason.

A LITTLE more than two years ago Pauline Mason was a co-ed at Northwestern University, at Evanston, Ill., just outside Chicago. Now she is leading woman in "Honeymoon Lane," the Eddie Dowling musical show, concerning which it seems to be definitely established that it is playing at the Knickerbocker Theatre. (A scouting expedition is out to try to learn the matinee days and will probably report next week.) At all events here is Miss Mason, ensconced in that short space of time as a Broadway actress, although she has never read a success story in her life. It certainly must prove something.

At Northwestern Miss Mason was going to fraternity dances, football games, sorority teas and even studying enough to get by—in short, she was having all the customary experiences of the American college girl. Then came that disease known in educational circles and out of them as amateur theatricals, with resultant complications in the university's dramatic society. As a result of this experience she went completely native—as native as only one can go in Chicago—and over the protests of her parents got herself a job at Marigold Gardens during her Summer vacation period.

In the Fall she intended to return to her studies, but before that time she noticed a story in one of the papers about the imminent Chicago production of a musical comedy called "No, No, Nanette," in which Louise Groody was to appear. To the stage door of the theatre where it was to play she journeyed, with the result that she obtained a job in the chorus. Doing or dying for dear old Northwestern thus went completely by the boards.

Eventually she became understudy to Miss Groody. Then, of course, on the night that the star became ill and Miss Mason played the leading part, Florenz Ziegfeld would be in the audience. The upshot of his attendance on that particular performance of "No, No, Nanette" was that Miss Mason got a job in "The Comic Supplement," for which at that time he entertained high hopes. After the collapse of this Mr. Ziegfeld transferred her to "Louie the 14th," in which she played a small part and did a dance specialty.

When Eddie Dowling and A. L. Erlanger were preparing "Honeymoon Lane" they sought the services of Mary Eaton for the leading feminine rôle, but she was not available. Because of Miss Mason's resemblance to Mary Eaton she was suggested by Mr. Ziegfeld for the part. The Messrs. Dowling and Erlanger accepted the advice and the rest, if not precisely history, seems to be of sufficient import to justify this biography.

IT is only two years since Barbara Stanwyck, playing one of the principal feminine rôles in Willard Mack's play, "The Noose," spoke her first line on any stage. It is also only eight years since the armistice, in case you have forgotten. But—and this is more relevant—it is only nineteen years since this young woman arrived in the world—the exact locale being the more or less prosaic region of Flatbush.

And, since this seems to be one of those success stories, it is not more than four years ago that the persons who were guiding the destinies of the Erasmus Hall High School term play decided that Barbara Stanwyck, born Ruby Stevens, was not, and probably would never be, an actress. Whether or not this last point has been settled, the fact remains that while the principals of the high school play cast are today the home-loving young matrons of Flatbush, celebrated in song and story, the rejected young woman now has a job in "The Noose" which keeps her occupied about six nights and two afternoons a week.

When the Erasmus Hall routine palled on the young woman she started out in business as many other girls have done. The New York Telephone Company offered immediate employment as an operator in the offices at 15 Dey Street. By the usual process of business evolution she studied stenography at night school—and in due time handled the hooks and dashes of the Pitman system with dexterity. Any artistic trend of her nature was indicated by the fact that her stenographic duties were performed for a pattern company on Fifth Avenue.

From patterns to posing seems a logical step—and when taken by Miss Stanwyck it brought her to the Strand Roof, where she appeared as the "1924 Corset Girl," or, possibly, "The Spirit of Bacardi Rum" in the revue. Next she obtained an engagement in "Keep Kool," which graced the Globe Theatre during the Summer of 1924. From this production she more or less inevitably went into the "Follies of 1924." In so doing she lost the one line she had had in "Keep Kool," and her histrionic career thus suffered a setback.

This reverse carried her into the night clubs. The first was the Everglades, where she got back her line, with a few to spare, and was billed as a specialty dancer. Then Anatole Friedland opened his Club Anatole and brought Miss Stanwyck up to Fifty-fourth Street. And here again she lost her line. She also lost something in the way of costume—for she appeared in scant chiffon draperies upon which changing lights played.

Then one day, not so long ago, at dinner in a Forty-eighth Street restaurant frequented by theatrical people, she was introduced to Martin Sampter and Willard Mack. Her conversation disclosed to Mr. Mack the fact that she had had enough night club experience to undertake the rôle of Dot in his forthcoming play. She frankly stated she was not an actress, but Mr. Mack had a different idea, and after rehearsing and coaching her for a week or two decided she would fit the part nicely.

ADRIAN ROSLEY, who plays Louis Broussard, the young French solicitor in "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes," is a Frenchman by birth and thus his accent and mustache are real, though his manner and gestures are not.

Born in a small, southern French town, Rosley spent the first five years of his life there. Of them he recalls little, not even the name of his birthplace. Then he accompanied his parents on a tour through Eastern Europe and when they finally settled in Jassy, Rumania, he was sent to school for six years. Considering that sufficient education, young Adrian made his stage début in Jassy at the age of 14. Queen Marie was not in the audience.

Having decided, thereupon, to spend his days in the theatre, he came to New York, which he regarded as the most likely place to succeed. His first job here was with an Italian opera company at the Thalia Theatre on the Bowery where he earned $15 a week for singing in "Pagliacci," "Faust" and other grand opera favorites. While still at the Thalia, he answered an advertisement for actors—they had to advertise for them in those days, it seems—and his next rôle was in a musical comedy called "The Widow From Wichita," which, however, never got beyond the rehearsal stage, leaving Rosley, with the rest of the cast, stranded jobless in the middle of the Summer. Wandering from agency to agency, he was found one day by Tully Marshall, who was looking for a Jap to play in "Paid in Full." Marshall said Rosley was just the type. Rosley assured him he was not Japanese, but, nevertheless, he got the job. This stroke of luck netted him seven seasons in New York and on the road playing Jap rôles in "Paid in Full," "Bought and Paid For" and in vaudeville sketches. During this time, he also learned the business of stage direction and management and for a while directed a stock company in White Plains.

Since then, Rosley has appeared in a great many Broadway productions of a variety ranging from "Ruggles of Red Gap" to Mitzi's musical comedy, "The Magic Ring," and Leo Ditrichstein's play, "The Matinee Hero."

The Emergence of Miss Bennett.

WHEN Gus Edwards first presented his "Kid Cabaret" in vaudeville more than a few years ago the act included a group of youngsters in whom Edwards had great faith, but who were at that time unknown to Broadway. In the intervening years every member of the "Kid Cabaret" has climbed to stellar position, or a place close to it, in the theatre, the last player in the group to achieve success being Evelyn Bennett, whose performance in "Americana" is one of the features of the J. P. McEvoy revue at the Belmont. Associated with her in the "Kid Cabaret" were Eddie Cantor, George Jessel, Eddie Buzzell, Gregory Kelly, Georgie Price and Lila Lee.

The years which have intervened have never included a New York opening for Miss Bennett until "Americana." While she has been in "The Clinging Vine" with Peggy Wood, and in "Lollipop" with Ada-May, she has in each instance succeeded some one else, and spent most of her time on tour. Her "arrival" in this revue was therefore a double joy to her, representing, as it did, the fulfillment of a dream which began when she was 8 years old and appeared for clubs in imitations of Eva Tanguay.

News Of the Varieties

IT looks like a big Christmas for every one in vaudeville from Fisher's Mules to Jane Cowl, according to an announcement from the Keith-Albee offices, which goes into considerable detail about projected Yuletide celebrations both in New York and over the country. In fact, it seems that the only one connected with that branch of the theatre who is not going to enjoy the day is the chef of the N. V. A. club, who will have his hands full preparing the Christmas dinners that are to be served to everybody from opening acts to headliners.

Under the holiday greenery at the Palace this week the name of Harry Fox will be prominently displayed—and why not? Mr. Fox, it appears, will be seen with Beatrice Curtis in an act by Willie Collier named—you never would guess this—"The Bee and the Fox." Also on the program will be Valerie Bergere in something known as "Chinese Compensation" which is said to be melodramatically thrilling (what with "The Shanghai Gesture" it could hardly be otherwise), and Herb Williams, a member of the once not unceleb[rated] team of Williams and Wolfus.

It will be the Lockfords and Paul Tisen's orchestra who will headline the program at the Hippodrome this week, which announcement, doubtless, will go a long way toward stabilizing international relations, or the Sixth Avenue "L," or something. There will also be a schoolgirl prima donna, Hazel Vero, aged 16, who comes not from Kansas City or Little Rock, but from the Chatham Square district. Further than that, Miss Vero is out to be idle for Public School 1, of which she was recently a pupil. It is said that she will remain in vaudeville until she has assembled sufficient funds to go to Italy to study for opera.

Everett McCooey, son of Brooklyn's Democratic leader, and Richard Byrne, son of the Borough President, will stage their variety debut at the Flatbush Theatre next month, and any variations on the gag motif that they are out to "make vaudeville safe for democracy" will be gratefully received at Keith-Albee headquarters.

Cissie Loftus will be the headliner at Loew's State this week. . . . Nora Bayes begins her Loew tour in Washington on Jan. 2, and will come to the State the last week of the month. . . . Moss's Broadway will have one of the perennial Keith-Albee vaudevil[le] Karnivals, with Roger Imhof heading the vaudeville bill. . . . William (Desperate) Desmond is scheduled to appear at Moss' Colu[mbia] soum tomorrow in a sketch called "The Dude Bandit."

Weber and Fields will probably be seen at the Palace the latter part of February. They are scheduled to open in Chicago on January 23. . . . Mann Holiner and Alberta Nichols, who wrote song numbers for "The Parse" to give them an identification which seems necessary, are soon to appear in the Keith-Albee bo[ok].

LEVY OF LONDON

A YOUNG Oxford undergraduate went to Paris and Brittany this Summer holiday to study French. As he did not particularly relish the task—as who does?—he started to write a play which he finished the following Winter, scribbling bits of dialogue in school time-rooms and corridors. Beau W. Levy was the dramatically inclined student—he was just twenty when he completed the manuscript of "This Woman Business." For five years, like many another play, it went begging. London managers were sent manuscripts, but whether they read them or not is uncertain. Some returned the copies; others neglected to do so.

Meanwhile, Mr. Levy acquired an Oxford degree and entered the publishing firm of Jarrolds. One day it occurred to him that at least he could see his play in print if not on the stage. Hence he arranged for its publication. In this fashion it came to the attention of the Play Actors' Association, which put it on for one of its special Sunday nights. In book form, it also caught the eye of the late Frederick Harrison, manager of the Haymarket Theatre. He gave it a professional production last April with Fay Compton playing the part of Crawford, Leon Quartermaine as Hodges and O. B. Clarence as Sir Bingham.

Mr. Levy was born in London of Australian parents. He is now 23 years old; wears the tweeds and speaks the crisp clipped English of his native land. He is at present in New York, having made his first trip across the Atlantic to supervise the production here of his comedy, which recently opened at the Ritz Theatre.

Until the presentation of "This Woman Business" in London Mr. Levy had written no other play. But since then he has dramatised Hugh Walpole's novel "The Portrait of a Man With Red Hair" and also written a farce entitled "Recurring Decimal" which was scheduled for production in London this Fall by Basil Dean but was banged by the English censor.

BERLIN LETTER

BERLIN, Dec. 1.

THE Deutsches Theatre is no longer the scene of revolutionary explosions, as in the days of Reinhardt's youth. But under this producer's management a high level of excellence is still maintained. Its failures are seldom dishonorable and, wonder of wonders, its successes almost never shameful. Commercialism, if you will, but of the enlightened species. The one eye cocked at the box office does not prevent the other being kept wide open, on the lookout for true artistic merit. The classics and the best of the moderns are varied with a touch ox French or American comedy. For only so can a theatre get along without subsidies, governmental or private. And even then it takes a magnificent showman (in any and all senses of that term) to keep the budget balanced year in, year out. In short, the theatre can't get along without that flare which our artistic brothers of literature and painting are in the habit of contemptuously calling the theatrical.

To the honorable half-successes only can be reckoned, "Peripherie" ("Outskirts"), Reinhardt's first production at the Deutsches this season ["Peripherie" has been announced for New York and George Abbott is making the adaptation.—Ed.] This drama from the Czechoslovakian of Frantisek Langer starts well, but later ties itself into knots which the author is unable to loosen at the final curtain. A pity, for in the early scenes he discloses real talent for characterization and its expression through dramatic form. Another victim of the Teutonic notion that it is not enough to write a straightforward stage play—the "genius" must evolve and tack on some abstract inductive generalization, varnished up to date with a coat of pseudo-science!

The action of the play begins interestingly with the return of a convict, Franci, to the apartment where he had lived with his two pals before he was sent up—only to find it now occupied by Anna, a prostitute. As Franci is an attractive youth, he soon wins her sympathy (and the usual physical remainder). Next day he discovers his comrades, who were also his partners in the petty robbery for which he was sentenced. In the meantime they have both become respectable, one even being employed by the city as assistant dog catcher. This has not prevented them from selling Franci's dress suit, which he now needs to resume his former occupation of waiter.

A few evenings later Franci finds a despicable old rounder, Urban, with Anna in her room. Urban, at the sight of a man, shouts for the police, and Franci, to silence him, hits him over the head with a chair leg. The blow is fatal, and after some moments of despair Franci gets the notion of carrying the body to the near-by scaffolding of a building under construction. He notifies the police and, as a large sum of money is found intact in Urban's wallet, they believe that the latter has lost his footing and fallen. The widow, who is very glad to be rid of her unpleasant husband, even goes so far as to reward Franci for finding the body by giving him the deceased's clothes—among them the desired dress suit. Franci, who has always had talent as a dancer, then gets a good position with Anna as a partner.

So far, so good. Now begins the metaphysics. Although the murder was quite unintentional and everything goes to show that Urban was much better out of the world, Franci suddenly commences to feel remorse. He tries to get the weight off his mind by making confidants of his friends. In their new-found rôles of respectable citizens they are horrified and much relieved when he is finally forced to pretend it all a joke. Still driven by his conscience, he confesses to the police, but, as he does not want to compromise Anna, he can offer no adequate motive for the crime. So they send him off, believing him to be merely an example of the professional penitent. In desperation he seeks advice from a drunken old hobo who was once a Judge but was put out of his office because he tried giving his decisions according to the dictates of abstract justice. This luminary greets him as a brother fanatic and counsels him to commit another murder and then suffer his just punishment for both at the same time. Franci confides this to Anna, and she, in a moment of masochistic eroticism (I take it), offers herself as the sacrificial victim. After protesting halfheartedly, he strangles her and calls in the police.

I need hardly point out that such a plot development is only possible if handled pathologically: Franci as an example of diseased, deranged mentality. The story in its present broad outlines would, I imagine, be conceivable as a basis on which to build a scientific study. True enough, it could not appeal to the general public, but it would be water-tight drama.

Frantisek Langer, however, has chosen quite another approach; namely, the ethical—one might also go so far as to say the moral. Indeed, I suspect him of being one of those writers who rather look down on science as mere craftsmanship and who think that the "inspiration" of the poet is all. In an essay in the program he acknowledges his debt to Freud for the idea of the subconscious, but adds that he has developed it quite unscientifically, with the "romance" of the theme chiefly in mind.

This is, of course, arrant nonsense. Such a subject cannot be handled from that angle. The great classic example of the drama of guilty conscience, "Macbeth," is anything but "romantic." Shakespeare developed the two leading figures with an infinite realism, a superb verity of detail. That they express themselves in immortal poetry does not affect this in the least. Langer, on the other hand, has only fitted together a series of "effective" scenes. The first part of the play is good crook melodrama with a jolly, eminently sane youth as hero. In the latter part the same character, with utterly inadequate motivation, develops hysterical pangs of remorse and at the end goes quite insane. And all, apparently, to drive home a "romantic" ethical idea which in its imbecile egoism makes the religious fanaticism of the dark ages seem mere kindergarten.

There has been much written lately about the clumsy fingers of the psychologists and the Freudians smudging up the classics. I quite agree that many of these protests are justified; the reading of the complex and sexual perversion into works like Hamlet, for instance, is as far-fetched and pernicious as was the pedantry of the old-fashioned commentators. But, at the same time, I feel that far too little exception has been taken to the fingers of the writers who have been fumbling with the problems of modern scientific psychology.

Reinhardt's production of the play was, on the contrary, anything but superficial. His style of direction is admirably suited to the early portions of the drama; and to say that he made less of the later parts is surely the mildest sort of censure. Once again he showed that extraordinary talent for the creation of character. With an inflection or a gesture he individualised the various rôles. Hermann Thimig was the gay, carefree Franci with primitive animal charm; Franziska Kinz the hard-surfaced Anna with melancholy pathos. Oskar Homolka and Paul Herbinger played the two friends in a fine contrast of brusque and quiet humor. Max Gueledorf, one of Germany's subtlest comedians, made a real tragi-comic figure of the old Judge—more the latter than the former, thank Heaven! Indeed, I am tempted to go right on down the complete cast of over twenty—for Reinhardt is actually getting an ensemble together again. What a feeling of security it gives one to read that the second policeman is played by an actor who will be the Bottom in "A Midsummer Night's Dream" only a few weeks hence.

CONCERNING GEORGE WHITE AND HIS "SCANDALS"

Difficulties, Mostly Financial, of Several Earlier Productions

WITH George White's "Scandals" coining $40,000 or more at the Apollo Theatre every week with the precision and certainty of a United States mint, the young man who stands sponsor for these revels must seem to all such outsiders as ponder on the matter to be on his way to becoming a Times Square Croesus. Which he is, even with salaries and production costs being what they are, for between $18,000 and $20,000 a week is the Broadway estimate of his profit.

But it was not always so. It is only within the last three or four years that George White has achieved any sort of financial security. This is the eighth "Scandals"; they have all been more or less successful and certainly none was a failure. The reason for White's frequent insolvency obviously was not the circumstance that he went broke on his various shows; rather it may be traced to his early penchant for placing all the money within his grasp on such horses as he felt had a chance on the country's race courses, from Belmont Park to Tijuana. Sometimes he was right; just as often he was wrong. On one pony he claims to have won between $400,000 and $500,000, but he lost that and more on others.

But this is history, for since the fourth "Scandals" White has eschewed betting of all sorts, including the sure things which always promise to pay 20 to 1 or better. No longer can a friend borrow a copy of Racing Form from this dapper personage and have the l[atter] supplemented by inside tips. For four years White has been a reformed man, and the change is certainly for the better in so far as his theatrical endeavors are concerned.

It was in 1919 that White came out of vaudeville with a fixed determination to break into the then charmed circle of the revue producers, in which cabal the Brothers Shubert were Supreme Inner Guard and Lord High Outer Shah and Mr. Ziegfeld the Exalted Commander of the Loyal Legion. At that time the ever unpredictable White had a bank account of $12,000 and an earning capacity in the music halls of $1,500 a week. The fact that he was worth that much to the Palaces, Orpheums and Hippodromes of the land and could go into his dance (it was not then the Black Bottom) any time he wished scene designers, costumers and other theatrical outfitters to take his notes for a considerable amount of the money involved in the production—which was about $60,000 in all.

The first performance of his 1919 revue at the Liberty Theatre was anything but a smashing success. Every detail, in fact, seemed to go wrong, and it was a discouraged though not completely disheartened young man who started early the next morning on the task of healing and doctoring the near-corpse. The entertainment responded to treatments and turned out in the end to be a rather good show which did business both here and on the road.

At the close of the first season White was, if anything, ahead of the game and he started upon his second presentation. While preparing this diversion, his predilection for the horses reasserted itself—he was broke off and on all during his vaudeville days because they weren't running right—with the result that when the curtain was raised on the second "Scandals" George White was again financially delinquent. Once more the production was made on credit and made successfully unless figures, against all tradition, do lie. It cost him between $75,000 and $80,000 to do this show, and although its profits were also dissipated at the race track he made preparations in the grand manner for the third number of the series, which was to be his magnum opus. This necessitated an expenditure of about twice as much money as had been lavished on the previous "Scandals." When he returned to New York after touring with his troupe, he once more engaged in his favorite relaxation, and it must be recorded, even at the risk of becoming more than a little repetitious, that the results were not only unfortunate but downright disastrous. White came back from the track that time with $600 to his name. He had lost all the money the show had made, and he still had a large pile of bills to meet. The $600 he planned to spread over a period of two weeks (he had his mother to support and other incidental expenses which made the sum no more than adequate), for in that time he confidently expected something to turn up. Something did in the form of an offer to play ten weeks of vaudeville at a salary considerably larger than he had ever received before.

While he was toying with the idea of this two-a-day engagement certain of the rumors that are always sweeping up and down Broadway were carried back to his ears. He heard faint but audible comment to the effect that he was through and that at last the hoofer would have to go back into his dance. (It was still not the Black Bottom.) These undercurrent rumors, emanating from the wise boys around town, caused him to change his mind. He would produce another "Scandals" and show them all.

Never without a certain ability at salesmanship, White went to Max Dreyfus of Harms and induced that worthy to give him $10,000 for the musical rights to any show he might do. Then White persuaded Jolson to lend him $25,000, which the Favorite Son of the United American Mammies, Ltd., did, in addition to buying in on 25 per cent. of the revue. By this time it was July, and the "Scandals" opening date customarily was in the middle of June.

This fourth show, seen at the Globe in 1922, was, White says, written and assembled in about two weeks' time, and during such intervals as he could escape from the frantic authors he wandered up and down Broadway signing nearly every one who was not at the moment working to appear in it. This frenzied search for talent resulted, somewhat to his astonishment, in the opening night discovery that among those employed by him were W. C. Fields, Paul Whiteman and his orchestra, Lester Allen, Pearl Regay, Winnie Lightner and others whose salary checks bore curious resemblance to the statement of the Corn Exchange Bank. White was trying to make a good showing for Jolson, who in the end was well reimbursed for his outlay. At the finish of the run White offered to let Jolson become a 25 per cent. owner in any show he might produce, but the comedian, not wanting any more worries than ordinarily fell to his lot, declined.

White by then had learned his lesson. He foreswore the turf and gambling of all sorts. Since then, he asserts by all he holds dear—the advance ticket rack in the Apollo box office, for example—that he has not bet on a race.

That was the only "Scandals" except the first, to which Sam H. Harris contributed, to be financed by money other than White's own. And since then only his capital has been invested in the revue. The following Summer he produced a negro entertainment, "Runnin' Wild," and the not inconsiderable returns he made from this comparatively nursery venture were put in, of all places, a bank. So were the returns from the fifth, sixth and seventh editions of the entertainment to which White devoted practically all his time and energies.

Lately, then, he has not had to go into his dance. He has not even done it for the sheer pleasure of hoofing in recent versions of what promises to become a Forty-second Street institution. He is not doing it in the current show, although it is an original dance of his which has been one of the hits of the production. And that, of course, is the Black Bottom.

George White will eagerly welcome statements from this or any other pulpit this Sunday morning which make it clear that he, and he alone, was the originator of those grotesque [ra]tions to which the name Black Bottom has been applied. It is also one of his claims to have introduced and popularised the Charleston in "Runnin' Wild." While preparing the current "Scandals" he was looking for a dance which might follow the Charleston, then rapidly becoming passé. This dance, it seems, was done to an on-beat and off-beat rhythm. It occurred to the producer that if you could dance before the beat you would have a new rhythm—a conclusion more ingenious than it sounds. He experimented with it, and the result is the Black Bottom.

The ungainly motions of the dance, which, according to Variety, is sweeping this and other countries, are a synthetic creation on the part of White. To him belongs the glory—or the blame. And, perchance, should you wonder why the man who produces such an ornate and worldly extravaganza as the present "Scandals" should concern himself so vitally in originating a dance called the Black Bottom and take such a pride in its acceptance by all of last year's Charleston addicts and others, you must remember that this White is, first and foremost, a hoofer.

THE MAIL BAG

Dissent.

To the Dramatic Editor:

All the learning and common good sense of Dean Arthur Hobson Quinn cannot convince me that "Beyond the Horizon" is O'Neill's "finest play." It is a good play. It may even be a better play than any written by another American playwright. I am ready to grant this, and also to admit that, barring one or two of the smaller rôles, it is as well acted as anything in town. But it does not touch "The Emperor Jones," "The Hairy Ape" or "The Great God Brown." The last named is, after all, the drama of the same two men of "Beyond the Horizon" grown up, esthetically speaking. "Brown" goes far, far deeper into the tragedy of the baffled artist-type and the almost equally baffled he-man. "Beyond the Horizon" is fine realism, but it has none of the subtle and sharp philosophical implications of the other play.

VAUDEVILLE SINGS CAROL

By WALTER J. KINGSLEY.

"TWAS the night before Christmas in a music hall of magnificence and Old Joke was calling upon Wise Crack who headed the bill and was the second feature. The place was a revelation to Old Joke who played his first show away back in 1880 when the first vaudeville troupe opened at the Lafayette Theatre far downtown. He found himself in an ornate dressing room with a bath attached, cedar closets, mirrors, electric fixtures of all kinds, and even a thermostat to regulate the temperature. Wise Crack told him that the playhouse had cost close to $5,000,000. "It must make you sore, oldtimer, to realize that you performers had to put up with in the days when vaudeville was variety," said Gag.

"Well, it might have been worse. We were happy even though the theatres were like barns and there was no running water in the dressing rooms and no heat in Winter. We got our laughs on the stage and that made everything all right. What burns me up is the way fashions have changed in comedy. The stage Irishman, Dutchman and darkey have gone, the minstrel is no longer popular, the auto-comic sister team has disappeared, and the quartet and the strong man are in the discard. Here and there a specimen of these one-time stars lingers on the scene, but is dragged along by the procession."

"You guys didn't know how to sell your stuff," ventured Wise Crack.

"You are wrong there. Audiences laughed just as heartily a hundred years ago as they do now. In fact I think that there was more good humor in the early days of variety than at present. They liked earthy stuff. Comedians made up with red noses and funny wigs and baggy clothes, the Dutchman stuffed his front with pillows, the Irishman wore great whiskers and spoke with a thick-mouthed dialect, the low comics used slapsticks and bladders and slippery-day stairs. It was rougher but it made 'em roar. When they started calling it 'vaudeville' the new fire hokum began to lose standing. Now the music halls are as polite as seminaries," replied Old Joke with spirit.

"I'll admit all that but in your time you played to stag audiences and the women and children never gave you a rumble. You were funny but you had no class. Nowadays we have to be clean and funny while you were smutty and funny and, with a lot of men out front, found it easy to make them roar," said Gag.

"I grant you that there has been a change for the better," admitted Old Joke, "but to my mind it is chiefly in the betterment of the business end of the variety theatre. Say what you will there always were great personalities and might clever artists in the music halls but it wasn't until the last few years that they got a break from the managers. Look at your Christmas for instance. Here you are in a cozy theatre all rigged up with holly and wreaths and mistletoe back stage; you performers have a tree and you are going to a dinner given by the management to all of you from opening act to headliner. You are drawing good salaries which are paid right on the minute. There's a true Christmas spirit here tonight. In my day the pay was poor and it wasn't certain."

"I guess you are right, old timer," exclaimed Wise Crack. "It takes a talk like this from a veteran to make us realize how well off we are. The main part of that first hundred years must have been pretty hard. Say, Old Joke, come over to the N. V. A. with us after the show. It's Clown Night and we'll put you on with some of the other Tony Pastor alumni and then we'll have supper in the grill room."

NEWS OF THE LONDON THEATRE

Modern Love Passages, as Exemplified in a New Play by Miles Malleson and an Old One by Frank Craven

London, Dec. 11.

THERE have appeared this week two plays of unusual interest—one valuable in itself because it is the work of a dramatist of whom much may be expected, the other made valuable by a piece of acting of which it was the occasion. Of the last I shall say little, though I should like to say much. Ernest Truex is already so familiar to American audiences that an elaborate analysis by a London critic of his performance in "The First Year" might, in this place, seem an impertinence. Of the other play, "Merrileon Wise," by Miles Malleson, which has been given a single performance by a Sunday producing society, I may write at greater length. And, strangely enough, though they are outwardly as different as two plays could well be, there is, in my own mind at any rate, a link between them. Each throws its own peculiar light upon the approach of modern dramatists to the love passages of their plays.

In discussing this subject I shall be driven to use a phrase that I heartily dislike. I shall be compelled to speak of "love scenes" which, for reasons that will presently appear, has always seemed to me an expression to be avoided. Perhaps I care too much about the choice and arrangement of words. I think of them, not with cold reason as the currency of a writer's trade, but with emotion as if they were human beings. To use them rashly, to let pass an ill-considered sentence, is like hitting a child or sending him upon a journey without money and with too few clothes. There are, too, certain phrases so distasteful to me that I will make a careful detour in order to avoid their company—phrases, I mean, which are not necessarily ugly in sound or repulsive in significance, for these all men avoid when they can, but phrases that I dislike because they are slovenly or pretentious or false. Shall I call them the "bluffers" of language? They appear to be rich in meaning; closely examined, they are found to be either deceptive or altogether meaningless. I shall, for example, always hesitate to say that an actor's performance was "convincing"; the meaning is, I suppose, that the performance gave to the spectator some kind of illusion of some kind of life. But what kind of illusion? What kind of life? Are those who have not seen the performance brought any nearer to a mental picture of it by being told that it was "convincing"? The word is too vague and uncertain to be of use in impressionist criticism—or so it seems to me. Yet there are other critics for whose taste and opinion I have a great respect, who use the word without misgiving, just as there are men whose choice of human friends and companions differs radically from my own. I do not doubt, therefore, that there are many to whom the phrase "love scene" is unobjectionable and who will consider my dislike of it fantastic. I shall nevertheless continue to dislike it because it contains for me a suggestion of that very theatricalism, that air of playing to an audience, which, on the modern stage, is generally destructive of the illusion of love. You will remember a story of Turgenlev's called "First Love"—it is included, in my English edition, in the volume entitled "Torrents of Spring"—as exquisite a tale as has ever been written of the sweetness and pain of youth. It has an air of confession, of secrets whispered within the soul. To speak of any passage in it as "love scene" would be a form of sacrilege and a gross piece of critical bad taste.

This long divagation on the use of phrases and of one phrase in particular is not so irrelevant as it may have seemed. I am unwilling to speak of any part of "Merrileon Wise" as a love scene, although its subject is love, and my unwillingness may serve, after what has just been written, as an indication of the play's quality. I do not wish to match it with Turgenlev's little masterpiece, for it is a play full of imperfections—of so many imperfections that some critics have been blinded by them to its merits and have been moved to general attack upon it. The story can easily be told in such a way that it sounds no more than sentimental trash, but a critic eager to destroy might play the same trick on Turgenlev's tale or on "Romeo and Juliet." Nothing in criticism is easier than destructive ridicule. But, if we are seeking to exhibit merit and not to obscure it, it is best to give only a plain outline of the narrative of "Merrileon Wise," together with a warning that such an outline cannot represent the atmosphere of the piece. We are shown, then, how a young and beautiful girl becomes engaged secretly to Mark, a musician; how her father, because Mark is penniless, turns him out of the house; how he becomes famous as the composer of an opera and returns to Merrileon only to tell her that the doctors have condemned him to die in a few months; how she goes to him nevertheless; how his realization that his genius can never bear fruit is of such importance to him that his love for her is dwarfed by it, and how, while she is tending him, he dies. What an opportunity is this for the ridicule of critics! How easy to point out what is indeed true, that the development of the story—the successful opera, for instance—is a conventional one! This and a crowding of motives in the last act are imperfections so grave that no one will claim for Mr. Malleson that he has written a great play or even a particularly well-balanced one. But amid all his imperfections as a dramatist Mr. Malleson has a supreme merit—that, when he writes of love and love only, he does not write "love scenes." His lovers do not give any suggestion that they are striving for effect before an audience. They are, as all lovers are in life, sufficient unto themselves. They are caught up in a rapturous or tormented dream from which all the world is excluded.

Now this, on the modern stage, is a rare and beautiful achievement. It is rare, I think, for two reasons—the obvious one that, whereas there are many contrivers of plays, there are few artists on earth, and the more subtle reason that the highest moments of love are by nature inarticulate. This last difficulty was overcome by the old dramatists' use of verse. Their poetry, like our removal of a room's fourth wall or our arbitrary dealing with time and space, was a convention of the stage. They knew and their audiences knew that human beings do not speak in blank verse. But the convention was accepted and its unreality was a cover for the unreality of their portrayal of love. When we watch a play in verse the conversation of lovers seems to us no more unreal than other conversation. The convention, once accepted, is universally applicable and we reach the love-passages without surprise or shock. In the modern theatre all this is changed. The dialogue aims at being naturalistic and the conversations of lovers are, therefore, in perpetual danger of seeming either cold and stilted or, if the dramatist has attempted to fill them with imaginative passion, unnatural.

Frank Craven has avoided this difficulty by two ingenious tricks. The lovers in "The First Year" are ordinarily shown to us only in what may be called the "off-moments" of their love. They are in the presence of the girl's family or they are giving a dinner-party or they are busily preparing for it. It is very skillfully implied that they loved each other. You are made to feel that they did by such indirect means as Mr. Truex's pathetic unhappiness when he believes that the girl is lost. Mr. Truex is not only a comedian of high originality but he has the tragic quality that marks the great clown or jester who is not merely a buffoon. He is able to suggest in a dozen secondary passages that Tommy and Grace loved each other. But only once is an open expression of their love nearly approached and then Mr. Craven plays his second trick. Grace is sitting on Tommy's knee; they are alone; now, you think, we shall see how the author will write a love passage—how he will steer between the rocks of coldness and unnatural fervor. And suddenly he switches off the stage lights. When they go up, Grace's mother is calling Grace to bed and Tommy is escaping through the window.

Mr. Malleson, on the contrary, has used no tricks of avoidance. His lovers speak their love in our hearing and they speak it in the language of the modern world. Yet these love passages have all the magic and exaltation of poetry. We are made to feel that there is holiness in them and that the lovers are raised into a world higher than our own. If you ask how it is done, I can answer only: "By sincerity and by a brilliant selectiveness." Mr. Malleson has felt deeply what he has written, and he has made a choice of prose which, while it includes nothing that is foreign to common speech, has an effect of enchantment. Is it, then, better, I hear some one ask, than the prose of Congreve or Sheridan? Certainly it is not; but the comparison is to no purpose. Congreve and Sheridan enforce my argument. Their works stand between the great poetic tradition and the naturalism of today. Their plays are deliberately artificial. Their love passages are all addressed to an audience; though we may admire them for a thousand reasons, we are not personally moved by them. The task of modern dramatists is to break free from the Congreve-Sheridan tradition and to carry us into a poetic world on the reluctant wings of naturalistic dialogue. Miles Malleson is one of the few who are able to accomplish it.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 16.—Avery Hopwood's "The Gold Diggers" has finally opened here, seven years after its New York presentation. To convey the impression that this comedy has won the town, or for that matter the critics, would be deviating a bit from veracity. Far from it. "If this is life," wrote the dramatic critic of The London Times, "give me death." He was too polite, it is needless to point out, to indicate "life in New York."

The Daily Express observes that the play is "calculated to shock every person who has any regard at all for the theatre. It is a bitter attack on the morals and habits of American chorus girls. Thank Heaven, it is not true of London." The Express speaks with deep feeling concerning the 3,000 odalisques who are now, it says, rehearsing in 115 pantomimes throughout Britain.

Nevertheless, the play, with Tallulah Bankhead as the golden-hearted chorus girl and Jobyna Howland in the part she acted in New York, has every chance for success.

Jed Harris is wondering whether London will believe "Broadway's" story of New York life or merely laugh at it. Harris, who was here six years ago, had evidently forgotten in the interim how peacefully the current of British night life flows. Now, after refreshing his memory, he is wondering whether "Broadway" will be dismissed here as old-fashioned melodrama which found its way into the fashionable theatre by mistake.

Wycherley's Restoration comedy, "The Country Wife," was revived here last week for the first time since 1748. This is the play which the late William Archer called "surely the most bestial play in all literature," and the audiences here, if not so final in their decision, seemed to doubt whether it had any merit which warranted a revival. This, too, though its dialogue had been purged of much grossness.

AN ACTRESS FROM RUSSIA

ONE expected the interpreter of the spirit-haunted Leah in the Moscow Theatre Habima's production of "The Dybbuk" to be large, imposing, black-eyed. But Anna Rovina is not. Her profile is like curved ivory; her shiny brown hair is drawn back and knotted heavily along her neck. But her eyes are roving, of a curious texture, like crushed stone, of many colors crystallized into living circles and rimmed with black lashes.

"No, we did not have any hardships on Ellis Island. If we had not been so tired after eight days on the sea we would have enjoyed it. It was a strange experience, like seeing pieces of every country collected together in one place. On this side"—she gestured with her hands as if her apartment at the Ansonia were that room at the island—"a family of negroes; on that side, a Jewish family gathered around a seven-branched candlestick with the old father went through the nightly ceremony of the Chanukah celebration. In that corner, old Spanish women in red shawls, sitting and knitting; in the other corner, a big, black-bearded Russian dancing and clapping his hands. And in the centre, an Italian and a Jew fighting like madmen! Their arms went around the farmers flailing the grain!

"We were made comfortable there; we had rooms to ourselves, and fresh linen. Never before had I been in 'prison,' or had to go before a Judge. It was very interesting, especially as we knew we were in no danger. But it was like—like being invited to a palace, and then being received in the cellar instead of in the drawing room!" She laughed. "But now we are calling the 'drawing room,' and it is so amazing—so much more wonderful than we ever thought."

In Russia of Czarist times people occasionally prefixed the word actress to actress with an apology. In one of Tchekhov's stories a woman says, "My brother became—excuse me—an actor." When Anna Rovina, as a child, participated in the school performances for the benefit of the library of the tiny town of Beresin, Minsk, where she lived, her orthodox parents promptly resorted to the slipper.

She was studying the Froebel method of pedagogy in Warsaw with the intention of becoming a school teacher, when N. L. Zemach, founder of the Habima troupe, met her. Something in that young woman with the delicate Oriental profile and the startling green-and-black eyes, told him that here was a potential actress. He persuaded her to take part in a play. With visions of herself acting some enchanting rôle, she accepted. The first dash of cold reality upon her dreams came when she found herself cast for the part of a woman in Sholom Asch's "In the Winter." She informed Mr. Zemach that examinations were at hand, and she regretted that they would take up all her time. He much laughed. "You can never play the most attractive rôles until you have learned how to play those that repel you." So she studied for examinations by day, and rehearsed in the evenings, but she eventually gave it up and went home to become a teacher.

Some time later she began to receive letters from Zemach, asking her to join the Habima as a regular member. The band had had many troubles, had been practically disorganized and scattered, but with the unfailing energy and hope Zemach was forming the troupe afresh. He was then in Moscow, and Anna Rovina was far away, teaching in a little town. This time it did not mean merely acting in one play; it meant deciding whether she would give up teaching and become an actress in a then unknown troupe, working hard for small pay, if any. She could not decide. Then Zemach wrote and invited her to visit him and his family in Moscow. No acting—just a visit. So she came to Moscow. There he found it easier to persuade her, and she found it easier to accept. But to this day her mother—she is now in America, in St. Louis—would rather her daughter had remained a humble little teacher than an actress, even if she had become the most famous actress in the world.

NEW PLAYS IN THE PROVINCES

MR. SOTHERN'S first Philadelphia performance in "What Never Dies," last Monday night, seems to have given that town a pleasantly sentimental evening in the theatre, as well as an acceptable comedy. What with ovations for Mr. Sothern and Haidee Wright, what also with Julia Marlowe taking it in from a box, all seems to have been pleasant and every one happy.

The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin supplies this paragraph of plot description:

"'What Never Dies,' as one may guess, is youth and love, and in the play which bears the title Sothern is seen as Tiburtius von Dollereder, a widower and father of two sons, who, in appearance and manner, are much older than himself. In spite of his domineering old mother, his antiquated brothers and the rest of his burdensome family, Tiburtius, although a grandfather, has persisted in staying young, has fled to Italy, and there, in a lovely villa near Rome, has a charming young wife and a four-year-old child, quite unknown to his relatives. They get on the track of his secret, however, summon him to the old family mansion near Vienna for a conference, and then follow his flight back to Italy, and there find surprise and their own undoing. The young wife loves her elderly husband, who is still young, and true romance has its triumph after all."

THE play in which Leo Carrillo is appearing, called "A Rough Diamond," reached Newark last week. Carrillo's rôle, says The Newark Evening News, is that of "a simple-minded, bluntly outspoken parish priest of Sableuse, more at home among his buddies of war days or consorting with his beloved poor than in the homes of the rich."

The News thus continues:

"And when this peasant priest goes to the big chateau, what a spectacle he cuts riding a bicycle, with his cassock tucked up and his old trench sabots and the woolen socks peeping out beneath. Then there is the scallywag dog, Poilu, that accompanies him. But worst of all is the rugged, picturesque language the padre uses, and his habit of calling a spade a spade with a directness and luminosity more in keeping with a soldier than a clergyman. But it is the language his own peasants know and through which he reaches their hearts.

"The big moment in the play is reached when, while on a visit to Paris, Father Pellegrin innocently patronizes the notorious Abbaye Theime restaurant. There we find him succumbing with Gallic abandon to the epicurean delights spread before him and sipping with hearty appreciation Chambertin of choice vintage.

"To his table comes a cocotte, who opens the simple-minded cleric's eyes to the real character of the place and its frequenters, and through her he gets a line on Mme. Cousinet, the ex-actress, wife of a war profiteer now installed as master of the chateau back in Sableuse. This woman has entangled his former war buddy and protégé, the young Count de Sableuse, in an affair that threatens to wreck his future.

"The Count and Mme. Cousinet arrive later and are confronted by the padre. The incident happily results in a breaking-off of the attachment, but a subsequent scene in which Father Pellegrin denounces the patrons of the place causes such a disturbance that the police are called in and he is placed under arrest.

"Everything comes out right in the end, of course."

AND then there was also "Sam Abramovitch," Anne Nichols's newest production, acted for the first time on Tuesday night in Washington. The play, which seems to be of unusual quality, was thus described by Philander Johnson in The Washington Star:

"Miss Nichols, queen of East Side farce, now brings a play of heart-wrenching significances. * * *

"Many in the audience who, misled by the title, expected another 'Irish Rose,' gardened by the familiar process of grafting a branch of foreign blossoming on domestic growth, were disappointed.

"There are laughs in the play. They are sombre laughs. They indicate no glee. They are submerged as incidents in a series of characterizations that release laughter only in a brave effort to forget the sordid truth in their lives.

"A playing company of sixty includes a cast numbering forty-five speaking characters. Not since the production of Hall Caine's 'The Christian' has a mob been so convincingly dramatized. It is a new mob, not composed of speedily drafted supernumeraries, but well rehearsed into integral association with the players.

"The play is unusual in structure. It leaves two impressions. It seems a series of tableaux developed with fine pictorial sense. Again, it seems a succession of intensely human episodes. The picture of immigration is cruelly truthful, showing to the logical finish the career of the idealist who seeks our shores and that of the mere avaricious adventurer.

"There is no attempt at poetic justice in the usual direct sense of the term. Avarice is satisfied. Idealism is content, even in the culmination of money disaster, to know that a child is to be born to take the place of the beloved son who died.

"Early in the play there are hints of Sovietism and the rest of the threats which hover over organized society. They all melt away in the reminder of simple humanity, suffering or successful, seeking betterment, yet patient in misfortune.

"In the estimation of producers, mob scenes are dangerous. This play brings to attention perhaps the greatest mob scenes ever rehearsed.

"Character analysis is the interesting element of the play. Intimate acquaintance is made available with the people from far away who have sought homes among us. Yet the simple story of love for a woman and honor toward fellowman constitutes the great interest in spite of a finely wrought pattern of descriptive detail.

"The play has, according to the taste of the auditor, the charm or the hindrance of a consistently dignified literary expression. It calls for recognition of the common impulses of humanity, whatever the speech and customs to which it may be born. It offers no solution to problems, beyond the admonition that true success cannot be claimed where there is sacrifice of honor."

carrying through the Summer. The plan, of course, would be to continue "Iolanthe," "The Pirates" and "The Gondoliers" in repertory, with the newest production naturally favored so far as number of performances is concerned. Barring a change of plans, the company will take the three operettas on tour next season.

Mr. Ziegfeld's "Betsy," which comes to the New Amsterdam on the 28th, will open in Washington on Tuesday night. . . . "Sweet Lady," not yet seen in this town, is expected to open in Chicago tonight. . . . Patti Harrold and Walter Regan head the cast of "Judy," a musical show scheduled to open in Brooklyn on Jan. 10. . . . Kilbourn Gordon and Chester De Vonde, authors of "Kongo," have written another. Mr. Gordon will produce it in the Spring.

Two plays called "Ballyhoo" impend, and both are said to deal with carnival life. One of them is already in rehearsal, being scheduled to open in Syracuse two weeks from now.

The Grove Street Theatre, which you may have forgotten about, is about to turn Grand Guignol. Georges Renavent, a French actor who has appeared here in a number of productions, will take over the house on Jan. 10 for the presentation in English of the plays used by the Grand Guignol company in Paris. The address of the Grove Street Theatre is 22 Grove Street, and you have to be a subscriber to see the shows.

The impending plays include something called "The Arabian Night," by David Tearle and Dominick Colaizzi. Mr. Tearle, unless there are two of them, is the English actor formerly known as Noel Tearle. As for Mr. Colaizzi, he is apparently unknown in the theatre. The production is in the hands of Clarke Painter, new in the producing field, and will open in Mamaroneck on Dec. 30.

Five productions departed this life last night—two to tour and three forever. "The Shanghai Gesture" and "The Donovan Affair," which had successful engagements, will be continued on the road: "This Was a Man," "Seed of the Brute" and the Bordoni "Mozart" are merely no more. Miss Bainter's play, "First Love," will close on Tuesday night of this week, taking to the road the week of Jan. 3.

USE OF SCHOOL MOVIES STUDIED BY EDUCATORS

By PROFESSOR F. E. SPAULDING, Chairman of the Department of Education, Yale University.

ANY profitable discussion of education and the movies should begin with the statement of a few outstanding facts which are generally recognized. Among such facts are the following, which would seem to have some significance both for education and the movies. So strong is the attraction exerted by public movies that an overwhelming majority of the more than twenty-five millions of children and youth in our educational institutions seek the movie theatres frequently and more or less regularly; particularly is this true of those living in cities, where a wide range of movie attractions is offered.

With extremely few exceptions, the pictures shown in movie theatres were neither planned nor worked out in detail for the purpose primarily of educating those who ight view them. While no little educational value is claimed, and probably justly, for some films, it can hardly be maintained that educational values were the dominant consideration in the production and exhibition of the films. Every one will concede great educational values to a much used railroad; but no one would think of giving such values as the dominant purpose of constructing and operating the railroad. With rare exceptions, picture films shown in movie theatres are produced for the purpose of attracting as many people as possible. Quite as much as any railroad, the entire movie business is overwhelmingly a commercial, not an educational enterprise. The measure of its success is counted exactly in the ticket office.

And the movie business has been so successful it is not to be wondered at that teachers have become greatly interested from the educational standpoint. What is it, they are asking, that so interests children in the movies? What are the educational influences of the movies shown in the public theatres? What educational possibilities do the movies offer? No thoughtful teacher or educational director can avoid giving most serious consideration to these questions, that are undoubtedly of fundamental importance from the purely educational standpoint.

Films Already in Schools.

But teachers and school directors in the most progressive schools and school systems are doing more than to ask these questions. Without waiting for generally satisfactory answers, they are equipping buildings with moving-picture machines and are devoting considerable time, in some cases regularly, more often intermittently, to the showing of films. In some cases it is sought to make the films an integral part of classroom work; more often, they are treated as incidental and supplementary, to be classed with a multitude of so-called extra-curricular activities.

If the fundamental educational questions concerning films could be answered conclusively before any action were taken, then obviously teachers and school directors would know exactly how to proceed, if they were to proceed at all. But there seems to be no hope whatever of answering these questions except through attempts to use films for educational purposes. When answers to these questions, at least approximately sound, are secured, as they surely will be, it will undoubtedly be found that many mistakes have been made. But mistakes, it would seem, are the unavoidable price that must be paid for bringing films under educational control, either positive or negative.

It would seem practicable, however, to minimize inevitable mistakes, at least to the extent of preventing the repetition over and over, perhaps hundreds and thousands of times, of mistakes that have been clearly demonstrated and recognized to be mistakes. Moreover, it would seem to be equally practicable to facilitate and promote sound procedure by making available to all interested such positive measures as experience and experimentation may demonstrate to be valid.

Need of Critical Study.

Every school that makes thoughtful effort to use films for their educational values, and the number of such schools is already large and rapidly increasing, is pursuing a course that may contribute something to the solution of the fundamental questions that the subject raises. But few schools, and few teachers and directors, are in a position to give to the subject the prolonged, critical and experimental study through which alone it is reasonable to expect very much sound progress in realizing for education the undoubted potentialities of the film. Nearly three years ago Yale University, through its graduate Department of Education, began such studies and is still carrying them on. At the same time those in charge of these studies are seeking to render such service as they can by acting as a kind of clearing house for the experiences of many who are trying out the educational possibilities of films.

Even several years before beginning experimental studies of the use of films, those interested at Yale University became convinced that precedent to any adequate testing of the educational possibilities of films, there must be films available that were conceived and carried out in every detail under the guidance of definite educational purposes and ideals. It seems almost obvious that films made primarily to appeal to the largest number, with little or no regard for educational values, must at best be seriously lacking as educational instruments, and at worst may be positively harmful. Experience with films abundantly confirms this first inference. To think of using for educational purposes films designed merely to entertain would be not one whit more absurd than to think of making a set of trashy novels serve as serious textbooks.

The first requisite then in any adequate study of the educational values of films is quite evidently the availability of films designed primarily for educational uses. Six years ago Yale University, through the Yale University Press, set about preparing such films in the field of American history. To date, fifteen three-reel and four-reel photoplays have been produced; eighteen more are in preparation. This series of thirty-three pictures, known as "The Chronicles of America Photoplays," covers outstanding features of the growth of the United States from the discovery by Columbus to the end of the Civil War. In the making of these photoplays historians, educators and film experts have cooperated for the purpose of producing films of the highest educational value.

Extensive and intensive studies in the use of these historical-educational films are being carried on now in the third year for the purpose of determining the most effective procedure. Comparative results of the use of films, textbooks, slides, pictures and maps are being carefully tabulated preparatory to scientific study. This study has not yet proceeded far enough to warrant a comprehensive report. Enough evidence, however, has already been gathered to indicate that it is possible to eliminate the harmful effects of the motion picture house attitude of passivity and intellectual torpor; to conserve the best emotional responses which accompany the showing of a movie, and to make the motion picture an intellectual challenge and a powerful motivation for work of the most approved character.

Impressions Gained by Students.

Illustrations might be multiplied of the power of these educational films to stimulate the organization of facts; to challenge thought and to leave a lasting impress upon the mind. An eighth-grade class in American history after seeing the film, "The Declaration of Independence," were so impressed with the different points of view represented by the men of the time that they were insistent that this was one of the most important things to take into account in telling the story of the adoption of the Declaration. This was rather startling evidence of impressions gathered from the film in an aspect of the subject which ordinarily would have little interest for children of this age. Again, a mixed class of children from 12 to 14 found the photoplay, "The Eve of the Revolution," so full of suggestion for a debate, which they had staged in connection with a mock session of the House of Commons, that they were constantly referring to the events depicted as though they were themselves contemporaries of them. A teacher who had used several of the films with two classes and had taught three other clases without them reported marked differences in the results of the regular school tests which were given on the history of that period.

As the film studies proceed at Yale University two things become increasingly evident. First, the enormous educational potentialities of suitable films constructed for educational purposes; the second, the necessity of developing a method of procedure and a technique suited to the realization of the films' educational potentialities, and the necessity of learning and observing this method and technique by teachers and pupils. At this time any final or confident decisions concerning the educational rôle that films may be expected to play can but be premature in the extreme, even though such decisions are arrived at only after considerable familiarity with the present film practices of schools all over the country.

This is really the attitude of the London County Council, whose Education Committee recently reported respecting the equipment of schools with moving picture apparatus, is evident from the report of a recent meeting of the County Council, as given in The London Times Educational Supplement, Oct. 30, 1926. At that meeting "Mr. Blake took exception to the Education Committee's report on cinematography in schools, because he felt that sufficient consideration was not given by the Education Committee to the possibility of new developments in the future. Mr. Webbe stated that the Elementary Education Subcommittee were alive to the need of keeping an open mind on the subject. The main difficulty at present in using the cinema for educational purposes was to be found in the limited number of films suitable for the school curriculum. Additional information had been submitted to the subcommittee that morning, and the officers had been asked to explore the matter further."

EMISSARY SEES MARKET FOR OUR FILMS IN RUSSIA

IN an interview sent out by his own office, Leon S. Zamkovoy, general director in this country for the Soviet film activities, says that Russia offers today an unparalleled market for the American producer.

"With the awakening of a new spirit in the Russian masses," he said, "and the widespread attack on illiteracy, which has been startlingly successful, there seems to be an insatiable demand for knowledge and culture of all kinds, America, in the main, represents to the Russian a land of incredible efficiency, and in his desire to imitate its ideas, as far as is compatible with his ideals, the Russian is eager for every bit of news of the life in this country. American motion pictures are of particular appeal.

"Of course, at the present time, America is not creating in any great number the films which would appeal to the Russian public because Hollywood is unfamiliar with the Russian trend of thought. I would suggest that a delegation be sent to Russia, selected from the major production companies of the United States, so that a close and comprehensive study might be made of the possibilities and necessities in the Russian cinema field.

"Not only is there an unlimited outlet for American motion pictures properly adapted to our needs in Russia, but Russia also offers a splendid background for the original production of films, particularly those with Russian atmosphere. And I have no doubt that we would cooperate with any group which would want to undertake a program of production in Russia working in close interchange of ideas and suggestions with our studios and directors.

"The Amkino, which is the new American - Russian cinematographic organization, was founded for the purpose of purchasing motion picture equipment and also of acquainting the American public with the production of Russian studios.

"I believe American audiences will note a new technique and original treatment of film-creating in the Russian cinema. 'Potemkin' has been heralded by the greatest critics outside of Russia as a radical departure from the stereotyped approach to life through the camera. Other productions which the Amkino will present will confirm this impression on the part of your people.

"To my mind the cinema offers a universal medium of interpretation and expression of one people to another. Our object is not propaganda, but the interchange of artistic creations for the screen. All art is universal and there is no reason why America should not accept Russian films of high artistic aim and achievement. Russia stands ready to consider and accept American films which come up to the standard which Russia has set for its own productions.

"I feel that it is only a matter of time when the American producers, in common with such discriminating men as Douglas Fairbanks and others, will come to see the contribution which Russia is able to make to the progress of the cinema and will join with us in a work of general cooperation and mutual advantages."

Gleanings From the Screen

The French production of "Michael Strogoff" is continuing at the George M. Cohan Theatre.

"The Gorilla Hunt" and "Old Bill" are being held over for another week at the Cameo.

On Christmas Day the Plaza Theatre will be turned over to children of the neighborhood and community groups. The film feature will be "Robin Hood."

The present feature at the Paramount Theatre is "The Popular Sin," an adaptation of a story written by Monta Bell. This film was directed by Malcolm St. Clair.

Ben Blumenthal, who has called attention to many foreign screen celebrities, is said to have discovered another picture possibility. Blumenthal's latest find is Anna Lisa Rydin, a Swedish actress, who at present is playing in Shaw's "Joan the Woman" in Stockholm. Miss Ryding is expected to arrive here next month.

Victor Seastrom has been chosen to direct Lillian Gish in "The Enemy."

May Edginton's story, "Purple and Fine Linen," in which Corinne Griffith will be featured, is to be released under the title of "Three Hours."

John S. Robertson, who directed Lillian Gish in "Annie Laurie," has been selected to handle "Captain Salvation."

CONSIDER EFFECTS OF MOVIES

PROOF of the keen interest in the development of motion pictures was afforded at the initial meeting of the National Club for Better Movies, when more than 200 persons gathered in the Majestic Hotel and listened to speeches in which ways and means for carrying out the purposes of the club were presented.

Some of the speakers, including Mrs. Mary Chapin, Dr. Winifred Stoner and others, stressed the importance of guarding the rising generation of children against films that would suggest evil to their receptive minds. Mrs. Chapin told of sitting behind two boys in a theatre where a picture concerned with a murder was shown. One of the youngsters said:

"There, that's how you hold a pistol to kill a man."

Mrs. Chapin said that children developed according to the healthy stimulation of their imagination and that no evil stimulus should be permitted.

The Baroness Katherone von Klemmer, Miss Edith Ellis and other speakers emphasized the necessity for correcting the many false impressions created in foreign countries by the poorer type of American pictures. The Baroness told how many of the natives of India imagined that most Americans had feet like Chaplin in his pictures. The speaker said that natives of the Orient disliked the long kissing scenes.

Mary Shaw, the well-known actress, in offering advice to picture producers and others, said:

"Whatever you do, keep it just one step above the level of those to whom you give it; lifting a little all the time."

The need for one theatre in every town devoted solely to and for children—where pictures and plays appropriate for their young minds could be shown—was another idea presented at the gathering.

Miss Vera McCord, President of the organization, expressed the hope that it would gain the support of parents and those who wanted to see on the screen a true interpretation of life.

Robert T. Kane has finished work on his production, "The Song of the Dragon," based on a short story by John Taintor Foote. James A. Creelman will direct Mr. Kane's forthcoming picture, in which Ben Lyon, Mary Brian and Sam Hardy are featured.

REFLECTIONS AND NEWS OF THE SCREEN WORLD

AN UNEVENTFUL WEEK

"Gorilla Hunt" the Only Really Worthy Presentation, Others Are Trivial

By MORDAUNT HALL.

THERE was a decided slump last week in the merit of the new pictorial offerings, which, with the exception of Ben Burbridge's "Gorilla Hunt," an absorbing big game hunting film, were of the type known as ordinary pictures.

The trivial affair presented at the Rialto Strand was called "The Girl From Coney Island" or "Just Another Blonde." Its story caused one to wonder why it was ever chosen for the screen, for it moved along in a lethargic fashion, relying chiefly on Alfred Santell's direction to make the most of some of its incidents. It was to have been released as "The Charleston Kid," but apparently the producers thought that there would be a stronger appeal in "The Girl From Coney Island" or "Just Another Blonde." The latter title will in all probability be used in the smaller communities.

In this feature there is a character named Scotty, who has to make sacrifices. Scotty saves James O'Connor, a confederate in dice throwing, from the hands of a disappointed gambler, which fact is used to bring the two men together. O'Connor eventually gives up his precarious method of making a living, and in the time that it takes to screen it, a mere matter of a second or so, he has accepted a good position with a banking concern. He is, however, never seen at work, and spends most of his time stealing the love of his friend's sweetheart, who decides to give her hand and heart to O'Connor. Evidently toward the end the producers found themselves with a sympathetic character—Scotty—on their hands, and although the hero and heroine were happy, something had to be done for Scotty. This is settled by having Scotty fall in love with the brunette, impersonated by Louise Brooks.

An airplane sequence is used to stir up interest in this production, and one or two scenes of this chapter are quite good, especially that in which the crowds are beheld running in all directions when an airplane turns turtle because of the loss of its undercarriage.

One of the chief supports of this feature is Dorothy Mackaill. Another is William Collier Jr.

Savages and Gorillas.

THE GORILLA HUNT" is not only remarkable for information regarding tribes of Central African savages and the excellent scenes devoted to the shooting of big game, but also for the keen sense of humor introduced into some of the episodes, through both the pictures and the text.

It may not seem especially funny to tell of a man sticking a safety pin through the cartilage between his nostrils, but to look at this act being performed on the screen by a serious-visaged pygmy, as this particular race is known, it has a decided touch of humor. The explorer-photographer found that he could curry favor with the pygmies by a spoonful of salt and a safety pin, and judging by the alacrity with which the pins were snapped up he was fortunate to have enough of them to put all the males in a good temper. Not only are the pygmies seen inserting the safety pin as a nasal ornament, but they also give it a tug so that it hangs perpendicularly from their noses.

Other trifling gifts saved Mr. Burbridge and his party from being the victims of cannibals. These dusky tribes were duly impressed when the white men killed an elephant, and they are seen making short work of the great animal's carcass, which, according to the information conveyed in the captions, they thought such a delicacy that they did not trouble to broil it. Scores of the black men are depicted dashing at the elephant, taking the meat to their dwellings to eat with some of the precious salt handed out by Mr. Burbridge.

In the scenes of the gorillas Mr. Burbridge shows how the cameras were camouflaged and how the great animals shook trees when they were startled. Three of the huge specimens, weighing something like 450 pounds, were killed, and three baby gorillas were captured. One of the extraordinary features of this film is an episode illustrating a young gorilla weighing 125 pounds playing with an Irish terrier. The gorilla evidently is much stronger than the dog, but from what one could see on the screen the performance was fairly good natured.

Another sequence depicts this same captive gorilla deliberating how he can reach some tree branches. He has one box, but it is not high enough and therefore he gets hold of a second box and puts it on top of the other and thus reaches the leaves of the tree. One might say that a dog could do the same reasoning, but the dog would, in this case, be handicapped by not being able to handle the boxes, as is done by the simian.

Boisterous Bebe.

THERE are many humorous if not witty moments in Bebe Daniels's new pictorial adventure, "Stranded in Paris." Some of the comedy is extracted by conventional running scenes in which Miss Daniels has to put up with a crowd of extras dashing over her and also hiding in various uncomfortable places. The narrative of this production fades from one's memory soon after seeing it, but one does remember a clever dog, an oversized Sealyham terrier, which ought to make a fortune in bones from the screen. Comedy counts for a good deal, and this animal, referred to as Lafayette, appears to have a future. He has a knowing way of using his eyes; he elicits no little sympathy from spectators. He is loyal to Julie McFadden, the heroine, and he is even willing to risk a beating so long as he feels that he has done his utmost to save Julie from a compromising situation. Lafayette crawls into vehicles and into apartments, often grovelling so that he does not attract attention from the human beings.

Julie McFadden, after buying a book on mental concentration, believes that there is hope for her to get what she wishes by forced thinking of her great desire. She wishes for a ticket to Paris and one is dropped at her feet from an airplane exploiting a make of perfume, which is referred to in the usual muddled Hollywood French as "La Belle Paris."

It is on the steamship bound for France that Julie encounters Roger Van Wye, who comes from a family of snobs. Roger, however, is not above kissing a pretty girl, and by the merest accident he embraces Julie.

No such story would be complete, however, without fractious performances in a strange conception of Paris. Hence Julie, an audacious young woman, is not in the least surprised when she is mistaken for the Countess Pasada. The hotel manager believes that Julie is merely impressing upon them that she is traveling incognito when she insists that her name is McFadden. She is shown to a suite of rooms, and she accepts the hospitality, not being in the least staggered by the arrival of half a dozen trunks filled with finery. More scurrying around follows when the Count Pasada arrives and is sent to the rooms occupied by Julie. There is a far wilder time when the real Countess, armed with a pistol which she is not in the least afraid of firing, appears.

A Dull Affair.

A GERMAN production, which has previously been called "Michael" and "The Invert," and which now is entitled "Chained," was presented at the Fifth Avenue Playhouse. It is a picture on the order of Oscar Wilde's "Picture of Dorian Gray," without anything like the drama or the interest of that unsavory though brilliant piece of work. Benjamin Christensen, now a director working in Hollywood, is the only worth-while player in the cast. The woman who lures the youth away from an artist is supposed to be a Princess. She might be, but she does not use the proper make-up before the camera. A Vilma Banky in such a rôle would give an excuse for part of this dull story. Then, the youth, a protégé and model of the famous artist, is much too conscious of the hawk-eyed camera to be anything but somewhat ridiculous.

Carl Dreyer, producer of this subject, proves that he has a flair for good lighting and composition, and an artistic bent for close-ups, so long as he is directing Mr. Christensen. But the story incidents have been handled in a very crude fashion, so that one is apt to examine the settings rather than watch the antics of the players.

AN out and out movie called "Corporal Kate" held forth at the Hippodrome. It is concerned with the highly imaginative idea of two manicurists who, through influence, are sent over to the French front during the war to be entertainers. The producers do almost everything in this production but make Corporal Kate lead a company over the top. She is dropped into a pool of water by the queer hero. Her friend is the victim of a bomb, and in the end the hero throws back Kate's cape and reveals that the girl has lost an arm.

This is another piece of picture work that starts out in a Mack Sennett vein and winds up as an imitation Seastrom melodrama.

MADGE BELLAMY'S RECORD

The Story of Her Career on Stage and Screen —In the Vitaphone Studio

AT the Capitol this week the principal attraction is the picturization of Warner Fabian's story, "Summer Bachelors," in which Madge Bellamy, the dainty Fox film star, is featured. Miss Bellamy has achieved distinction by her past performances in a number of William Fox's production, including the shadow versions of such well-known plays as "Lightnin'," "Havoc" and "Lazybones." She also played a prominent part in that worthy production, "The Iron Horse."

Miss Bellamy was born in Hillsboro, Texas, and when she was still a baby her family moved to San Antonio and later to Brownwood, where her father, William Phillipott, was a professor in the college there. Even as a little girl Miss Bellamy was studious, being especially interested in the theatre.

Her very first "performance" before the footlights was when she was 10 years old. It took place in a small town in Texas, where she and other youngsters acted in an improvised theatre. Madge had the privilege of selecting the play, and she chose "Hamlet," provided she could play Ophelia. When telling of this adventure not so long ago, Miss Bellamy said that she was even more excited when the curtain went up on that children's "Hamlet" than she was when she made her first appearance on Broadway before a real audience.

In a Barrie Play.

Her New York stage début was in a small part in "The Love Mill," a musical comedy. Her efforts attracted the attention of other producers, with the result that she received one offer to play an important part in Maeterlinck's "Betrothal," another from William Savage to play the lead in a new play and a third from George Tyler to appear in the title rôle of "Pollyanna" on the road. She chose the latter.

After touring the country with William Gillette in "Dear Brutus," Miss Bellamy appeared on Broadway in this Barrie play. Following that engagement she went to Washington to play in a stock company under the direction of Monta Bell. Her répertoire of plays there began with "Peg o' My Heart."

Frank Borzage, the director, was the first person to encourage Miss Bellamy to act before the camera. It was a test for "The 10th Commandment," but the making of this picture was postponed and Miss Bellamy's other engagements prevented her from appearing in this film when work did start.

Her First Films.

She was appearing in a play called "All For Love" when she met the late Thomas Ince. At the time Geraldine Farrar, whom Miss Bellamy admired greatly, was acting in films for Mr. Ince. Miss Bellamy was asked to go to the studio for a test and she went, more to meet Miss Farrar than to seek work in a picture. The test, however, was eminently satisfactory and Miss Bellamy's first screen performance was in "The Hidden Woman," in which she had only a small part. However, it was not long before she was featured in "Lorna Doone," "Hail the Woman," "The Hottentot" and "Soul of the Beast."

Penrhyn Stanlaws, the artist, referred to Miss Bellamy as the most beautiful girl in America. And not long after that Antoinette Donnelly included the little actress (she is only 5 feet 2 inches in height) among the twelve most beautiful women in the United States.

Making a Vitaphone Record.

TO those who have been in the habit of watching the work on pictures in an ordinary studio, it is a strange experience to visit a studio where Vitaphone records are made. In one place there is the noise of hammering, voices and snatches of music being played on the different sets. In the Manhattan Opera House, which Warner Brothers have converted into a Vitaphone studio, nobody is permitted to move, let alone speak, while a record is being made. For one reason, the musicians must not be distracted from their playing, and then also any unusual noises might be recorded.

The operation of recording an orchestra directed by Henry Hadley recently took place in the Manhattan Opera House. The orchestra seats have been for the most part covered with boards which run flush with the old stage. Hence the big place is virtually all one stage. Herman Heller, an orchestra leader who has made a special study of arranging scores for motion pictures, was at first seen conducting the musicians in their trial efforts on the score for "Manon," John Barrymore's new picture. In the back, and above the musicians, was a screen. It was not necessary to have the place darkened, as the conductor and others only wished to observe the change in the scenes for the different themes.

Eventually Mr. Hadley, who was in his shirt sleeves, took the baton, while Mr. Heller went to one of the rooms where it is possible through intricate devices to accentuate some sounds and diminish the tone of others. Mr. Heller kept in constant touch by telephone with the orchestra. He did not have to ask to be connected, for the assistant in front of the orchestra had a telephone clapped to his ears all the time.

The preparation of the music required infinite patience, for time and again fractions of selections were played and replayed.

Finally, when everything was ready, the signal was given and the orchestra went through the score for the whole reel. In this case, of course, no camera was used in connection with the Vitaphone record, which was only to serve instead of an orchestra.

PRESENT PRODUCTION COST CONTRASTED WITH LOW FIGURES OF THE PAST

Samuel Goldwyn Compares the Risk Now to What It Was Sixteen Years Ago

HAVING recently finished a production which he estimates cost him about $900,000 and being at present engaged in preparing for a new one, Samuel Goldwyn, one of the pioneers of the industry, is eminently qualified to talk on the financial outlay of the past and present in making shadow entertainments.

He was discovered the other day in a room of his suite in the Ambassador Hotel, perusing a script for his forthcoming venture, "King Harlequin," based on a play by Rudolph Lothar. He chanced to mention, as he put down the manuscript on the sofa, that the first scenario on this subject was written five months ago. He explained that Henry King, the director, and he had read that first script, and that they had forthwith decided that it would have to be re-written. Mr. Goldwyn, Mr. King and the scenario writer therefore spent several hours a day for about a month on the story and still they did not have what they wanted.

"We are now on the fourth script," said Mr. Goldwyn, "and we are still working on it. We found that the interest, in the first place, was not sustained and that although the story started off in a fine fashion it did not keep up the pace. Then there were too many characters and not enough comedy."

Pictures of the Past.

"Contrast this with the first picture in which I was interested," said Mr. Goldwyn. "That old production was the film version of 'The Squaw Man.' Cecil B. De Mille left New York City with Dustin Farnum, the star, and Oscar Apfel, the director, and three months later, besides having a studio started, they had a picture produced and delivered here. They met with all sorts of delays due to inexperience, but when the film was finished they felt that they had a masterpiece. The adaptation of the play and the photography had taken about six weeks.

"Immediately that production was finished it was decided to take more pictures. It was easy enough to get vehicles in those days, so we went out and bought six or eight stories. Among this batch were 'Brewster's Millions,' 'The Master Mind' and 'The Man on the Box.' On top of that we made a deal with David Belasco, obtaining from him the film rights to 'The Girl of the Golden West,' 'Sweet Kitty Bellaire,' 'The Rose of the Rancho' and 'The Darling of the Gods.'

"It was a virgin field then and therefore virtually all plays were available for pictures. Incidentally, before Jesse Lasky and I decided to produce pictures, Mrs. H. C. De Mille, mother of Cecil and William, then a play-broker, had the offer of the screen rights to twelve plays at $750 each. Cecil De Mille wondered why anybody would want to buy old plays. Two of these efforts were 'The Fatal Wedding' and 'Seven Days.' Some of these very plays have since been sold for $50,000 and $75,000. I believe that I am right in saying that in the last fifteen years more stage plays have been used up by the screen than have been produced in 100 years.

Geraldine Farrar's Films.

"It was only a few years ago that we thought we were bold when we agreed to pay Geraldine Farrar $20,000 to appear in three pictures. One of the considerations in the contract was that Miss Farrar was to have a private car from New York to Los Angeles. She went to California and in ten weeks she was back in New York, having in that time made three pictures and traveled to and from Hollywood. The three productions were 'Carmen,' 'Temptation' and 'Maria Rosa.' Cecil B. De Mille directed these films. It took him 19 days to make 'Carmen,' 8 days to produce 'Maria Rosa,' and 14 days to make 'Temptation.' At the time they were considered excellent pictures. 'Carmen' cost us, everything included, $20,000; 'Maria Rosa,' $15,000, and 'Temptation,' $18,000.

"If 'Carmen' were produced today with an artist of Geraldine Farrar's standing it could not possibly be done for less than $450,000, and I would not say then that for all that money it would be any better than the old picture. Where we now display much caution, in those days we acted with spontaneity and enthusiasm.

Miss Sweet's $400 a Week.

"In 1913 we had the temerity to engage Blanche Sweet at a salary of $400 a week. She had been receiving $150 a week with D. W. Griffith. We made the film conception of 'The Warrens of Virginia,' a remarkable production, and although we were enthusiastic about the results, we thought that we were getting out of our depth—that it would break us. If this picture were made today, what with the spectacular battle scenes and so forth, it would cost several hundred thousand dollars. And, parenthetically, I might say that in making the screen translation of 'What Price Glory' the Fox Film Corporation had to spend far more money than was expended on 'The Big Parade,' in order to reveal a satisfactory progress in the picturing of some scenes.

"The Kalem Company made a film dealing with the life of Christ for $2,500, and as a contrast to this, consider Cecil B. De Mille's forthcoming film conception of the life of Christ. His budget calls for the expenditure of $2,000,000 and he may even exceed that amount.

"To produce pictures of the type of 'Old Ironsides,' ten or twelve years ago a budget of from $15,000 to $20,000 would have been laid out. At the presentation of 'Old Ironsides,' just before the theatre was darkened, a Famous Players executive remarked that the curtain was going up on an investment of $2,250,000.

"When I elected to make a picture out of Harold Bell Wright's novel, 'The Winning of Barbara Worth,' I visualized the value of the background, considered the idea of impressing upon the spectator what irrigation meant to the desert and the danger from this same water through an inadequate structure. I was impressed by the wide circulation of the novel, more copies of which, according to the publishers, had been sold than any other book excepting the Bible. I could have made this picture in two ways—on the back lot of a studio or on a real desert. I chose to go to the Black Rock Desert in Nevada, because I wanted realism. We had to build a road there, and I took 800 persons to the spot on a special train. I paid $4 a day to caterers for tents, baths and meals for each person. We had also 280 horses there and different kinds of cattle. You can realize what the total expense was when I say that we were there for eleven weeks. If 'The Winning of Barbara Worth' had been produced twelve years ago, we would not have had to follow such a production as 'The Covered Wagon,' but as it was we had to make the finest possible scenic effects, and the consequence is that the bill for this production is close to $900,000.

Chaplin's Popularity.

"In the old days the average negative cost of Famous Players was about $15,000. The distributers gave us an advance of $25,000. Today the average negative cost of Paramount productions is $300,000. The average negative cost of United Artists productions is from $750,000 to $800,000. The other two big companies are confronted with an average negative cost between $240,000 and $260,000. These companies are all striving to make the most effective productions.

"So far as actors are concerned, take the case of Wallace Reid, who in his early picture days received $75 a week. At the height of his popularity he was paid $2,500 a week. Had he been living today, enjoying the same popularity he did in the past, he would have earned $10,000 a week. Then there's Thomas Meighan, who once received $100 a week for his acting. He is now said to be getting about $10,000 a week.

"Consider Charlie Chaplin, not when he was a beginner on the screen, but in those days when the country was wild about him, when they sold statuettes of him. He was working for the Essanay Company for $1,000 a week. It is interesting to note that his 'Gold Rush' has so far grossed $3,500,000, $1,000,000 of which came from Great Britain. But then there's only one Chaplin!

"In the past, and not so many years ago, it was thought a big salary when a director was paid $1,000 a week, $52,000 a year. This man produced six or eight productions in the twelve months. Now the foremost directors receive from $50,000 to $100,000 a picture.

"Henry King is paid $100,000 a production; Lubitsch gets the same figure. King Vidor, who used to be paid $15,000 a production, now receives $100,000. The reason for the high cost of directors is that there are relatively few topnotchers.

"Of the thousands who go to Hollywood to gain fame, how very few there are who get to the top of the tree. Thousands fail where one succeeds. Recently there have been Norma Shearer, Vilma Banky, Greta Garbo and Clara Bow. Of the men, off-hand I can think of only three, John Gilbert, Ronald Colman and John Barrymore. Of course, Mr. Barrymore was one of the greatest American actors, and in this instance I refer to his great popularity among motion picture audiences. I should also like to say that I am not including good character players, but only those artists who carry their own vehicles."

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURRENT WEEK IN MUSIC

WALTER DAMROSCH'S RETIREMENT

A Busy Life in Many Departments of Music—Conductor of Opera and Orchestra and Composer

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

ERAS come to an end; periods close; organizations cease; men die, others resign, and something is gone that has contributed to the benefit or enjoyment of the community. Such things are, no doubt, always happening; but when now and to us, the case seems unprecedented, unexpected and disastrous. Numerous ties have been broken in recent years that have connected the musical life of New York with earlier days. Now another one has gone; or is about to go. Walter Damrosch's resignation as conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, his giving up of active work as a musician, will put an end, with the end of this season, to his forty-two years of activity in the musical life of New York. It will be the close of a busy career that has had distinction and that has left a deep mark upon the artistic life of this city.

Mr. Damrosch is not by any means an old man, though he probably would be considered so by the (presumably very youthful) copy reader who put up a headline the other day in a New York newspaper about an "aged man's" accident, whom the "story" disclosed to be burdened with fifty-nine years of existence. He has only just passed the age of retirement established in the United States Army, which deprives the country of the services of men who may still be in their prime. But he wishes to retire, as he says, while he is "still young enough not to have to 'give' advancing years as the reason." He wishes to go while the public is saying "Why does he go now?" instead of waiting till, perhaps, it might say "Why doesn't he go?"

Mr. Damrosch began young and has spent a long time in the cause of music. It is conceivable that he would like to add to this period more years of a less strenuous kind; less strenuous in muscular activity, at any rate—for conducting is a vigorous exercise; less strenuous in the constant thought, study, planning and emotional output that are demanded of the director of a modern orchestra. It is hardly to be supposed that Mr. Damrosch will divorce himself entirely from the art to which he has so long been wedded. It is hardly to be supposed that he could, or so even if he proposed to. Music does not so easily let her votaries go. And the letter of Mr. Flagler accepting the resignation points out some fields in which Mr. Damrosch may be expected to continue his orchestral activities, even if at the same time he takes up some less violent ones.

It has been a singularly full and rounded career, as well as a vigorous one, full of hard work, that Mr. Damrosch now draws to a close. He has been conductor of opera, orchestra and chorus, composer of operas, incidental dramatic music, choral music, songs, ensemble pieces; he has lectured about music, and he has written a book—a very good one. Of course, in such a family as that which Dr. Leopold Damrosch brought to America from Germany in 1871 music was an absorbing issue; and the younger son was destined to it from the beginning. He got all sorts of the most desirable kind of training and was given the most enviable opportunities. His father died in 1885 after years spent in conducting the German male chorus, Arion, once prominent in New York, and the Oratorio Society, which he founded in 1874; the Symphony Society, which he founded in 1878, and finally, after the crown of his labors, his first season in conducting German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House—a new thing to New York, that opened new vistas and profoundly influenced the artistic future of the city.

Walter had been assistant conductor at the opera, and was given still more responsibility after his father's death. He came under even greater burdens as his father's successor at the head of the Oratorio Society and the Symphony Society. On an inexhaustible youthful vigor, enthusiasm and ambition could have kept up such an activity; though of course the orchestra in those days made much less exacting demands upon its conductor than it does now, with its vastly increased number of concerts. He continued at the head of the Oratorio Society till he handed its direction to his brother, Frank, in 1898; and kept on with the orchestra, with some intermissions, though several times it had needed an indefatigable energy to keep it going. In 1895 Mr. Damrosch went heart and soul into the "crazy venture," as some of his friends called it, of his Wagnerian opera company, and again in 1896-7 and 1897-8.

He sold his house in New York to finance this venture, he told in his book. In 1899 he devoted a year to composition. Again in the seasons of 1900-1901 and 1901-1902 he acted as Wagnerian conductor without the responsibility and risk of a manager, this time under the management of Maurice Grau, who had taken the lease of the Metropolitan Opera House. For one season, 1902-1903, Mr. Damrosch was conductor of the Philharmonic Society, the Symphony Society being in abeyance. Then, the next season, he reorganized and revived the Symphony Society on the same kind of cooperative basis as that upon which the Philharmonic had stood so long. But this was already beginning to prove an impossible basis under modern conditions; and in 1907 the old Symphony Society was called back to life and guarantee by a committee of guarantors, whose financial responsibilities Mr. Flagler later took upon his own shoulders alone. Those were the first days of "expansion" in concert giving, which has gone on and increased so much since.

Mr. Damrosch's compositions have been a not inconsiderable part of his artistic work. It is often said that a conductor runs into danger when he undertakes composition. The constant flow of other men's ideas through his head, which is a necessary part of his task as an interpreter, is likely to make an "eclectic" of him; a good many of those ideas are apt to stay there, and to swamp anything like an original or personal style of his own. Nobody else, probably, knows Mr. Damrosch's opera of "The Scarlet Letter" so well as he does. This is what he says of it in his book, "My Musical Life":

> The music was, I think, well written, but so much of it had been conceived under the overwhelming influence of Wagner that I am afraid Anton Seidl was right when he confided cynically to his friends that it was a "New England Nibelung Trilogy." Reviewing the work critically myself after these many years, I would say that it showed sufficient talent and musicianly grasp to warrant a composer's career; but life and its exigencies willed otherwise.

But such a summary dismissal of the composer's career is premature. There was still "Cyrano" to come, a work upon which Mr. Damrosch himself passes no judgment, but which undoubtedly denotes a great release from the Wagnerian bondage in which the first opera was written. And then there was to come also the incidental music for the Greek plays, "Iphigenia in Aulis," "Medea" and "Electra." Years before there had been the "Manila Te Deum," and there have also been several songs and a violin sonata. And now that Mr. Damrosch will be freed from the constant flux through his brain of symphonies, symphonic poems and overtures of other men, who knows what masterpieces may proceed from it?

Mr. Damrosch, in his long years as a conductor, has kept himself open to the claims of modern composers, as modernity has gradually unfolded itself to the present time. It was only the other day that he gave a chance to some of the most horrific and hopeless of modern "masterpieces." It is not his purpose to appall the bourgeois, but to keep his followers posted on what the moderns are doing. It is sometimes pretty hard on his followers, and it is not to be supposed that it is much easier for the conductor, or that Mr. Damrosch himself has loved, admired or approved all that he has set before his hearers. But in years past, before the great line of great masters was snapped, he gave first performances of many things that proved not only of absorbing interest at the time, but also of great and lasting value. Among them are the following: Wagner's "Parsifal," in a concert performance; Goldmark's "Merlin" and Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," at the Metropolitan Opera House in the German opera régime; a stage performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea"; Pierné's "Children at Bethlehem," a stage production. In his orchestral programs Mr. Damrosch introduced the names of Bruckner and Mahler for the first time to America—the former in connection with his Third Symphony in D minor, the latter in connection with his Fourth Symphony. Much more important were the first performances of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth and Fifth ("Pathétique") and his violin concerto, Elgar's First and Second Symphonies, Berlioz's "Sinfonie Funèbre," Stanford's "Irish" symphony, d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico," Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suites, Sibelius's Fourth Symphony and, in a concert performance, Tchaikovsky's opera "Eugene Onegin."

A part of Mr. Damrosch's work that has signified much in the sum of his New York activity has been the establishment of his "Young People's Concerts" twenty-eight years ago and then of his "Children's Concerts" ten years ago. They have had a deep and beneficial influence in forming the taste and cultivating the love of music among those for whom they were intended. Mr. Damrosch has not only played them music that made an appeal and aroused an interest; he has also added to the appeal and the interest by speaking about the music in terms that could be understood. Mr. Damrosch has always had an inclination to speak from the conductor's stand and has thereby sometimes added a new point and a new zest to what he was about to play. How greatly his young people have enjoyed what he has offered them is shown by the uninterrupted and increasing success of these concerts, as well as by the fact that they have very naturally and properly been the suggestion of other concerts of a similar sort, not only in New York, where there has been need of providing for more young people than could get into Mr. Damrosch's series, but also in other cities, even so far as London. These concerts are what Mr. Flagler has asked Mr. Damrosch to carry on after his retirement; and the fact suggests how near they are to his heart and how valuable he considers them.

Another great service that Mr. Damrosch has done is that of popularizing orchestral music in the open air in the Summer—an initiative that has produced results of widespread importance. Of similar importance is likely to be the newer project in which he is engaged of broadcasting orchestral music over the radio, reaching literally millions of listeners who would otherwise not be reached.

As an orchestral conductor Mr. Damrosch has usually been singularly fortunate in the making of his programs—a difficult art, one that is apparently not to be learned. Some great conductors have never mastered it. Those who have it have thereby much enhanced their power and influence. From a given repertory of orchestral music it is possible to make up programs that will be dull, stodgy, lacking in contrast and balance and an indefinable something that makes them interesting. It is equally possible to make others that have this indefinable quality of interest, of the complement that one portion gives to the rest and that cheers and sustains to the end. The good fairies gave this gift to Mr. Damrosch with the others they brought him. He has made good use of them all. There are very many friends who will miss their withdrawal from the public service.

FRITZ BUSCH IN REHEARSAL

A Glimpse in Dresden of a Conductor Who Is Soon to Appear in New York—Some of His Programs

DRESDEN, Dec. 1.

THE musical activity of Dresden is concentrated mainly in the palatial Renaissance opera house, where Generalmusikdirektor Fritz Busch is busily engaged day in and day out with the preparation and conducting of operatic performances and symphony concerts. Besides all this he has his forthcoming journey to New York to think about—not an inconsiderable matter when one considers the present competition of foreign symphonic conductors in the American metropolis. Herr Busch is evidently striving manfully to look forward to his overseas adventure with equanimity, as he well should, for besides his natural artistic gifts he is possessed of qualities which should assist not a little in securing him a fair degree of success in America, and among these are a robust youthfulness and an uncommonly pleasing geniality of manner. Nevertheless, there are rumors here to the effect that at times he is concerned with the thought of America and the responsibility he will have to shoulder there.

In conversing with Mr. Busch, however, one was unable to locate any such misgivings. He mentioned the recent receipt of a cable from Dr. Damrosch concerning certain details of his engagement, and was apparently as pleased as a child with this attention on the part of New York's symphonic leader. He spoke of other American musicians with whom he has lately come in contact, and expressed happiness at the prospect of meeting them once more in their homeland. He spoke of Theodore Stearns, whose opera "Snowbird" he has definitely accepted for production in Dresden. He paid high praise to the soprano Anne Roselle, whom he selected last Spring to create the rôle of Turandot in Dresden, where Puccini's posthumous work received its first production outside of Italy, following the world première in Milan. Miss Roselle, still a young woman, is engaged in the interesting experiment of "re-creating" her operatic career on this side of the Atlantic, apparently with commendable success, for with Dresden as a base of activities she has formed highly desirable contacts elsewhere, with the State Operas of Berlin and Vienna and with the Paris Opéra. Toscanini is also said to be giving her serious consideration for Milan. Thus it is readily to be seen that Busch is scarcely ungenerous in whatever reciprocal ideas he may have in mind, for in seeking fame for himself in the New World he makes it possible for American artists and composers to find opportunity for glory within his own domain. For one who is capable of such tact and diplomacy the prospect of America need scarcely be terrifying.

To reach Dresden's beautiful temple of opera from the main railroad station one walks through the marvelously picturesque streets and squares of the Altstadt (Old City) and emerges on the Theaterplatz, on one side of which broad expanse lies Semper's architectural masterpiece, erected in the '70s of the last century on the identical plot where stood the earlier edifice (destroyed by fire in 1869), in which the young Richard Wagner definitely launched his career and where, with rare delight, he had the opportunity to study the somewhat amazing eccentricities of the visiting Spontini, as told in "My Life." The present building has its memories, too. Nearly all of the Richard Strauss premières were held here, the most notable perhaps being "Salomé" and "Der Rosenkavalier." Many other great names are inscribed on the historic scroll of the house, including those of Schumann-Heink, Wedekind and Burian. Of the younger contemporaries, Rethberg and Reiner might also be mentioned as of particular interest to America.

Upon leaving my card at the office of the Herr Generalmusikdirektor, I was told that on this particular afternoon he was not occupied with his accustomed artistic activities, but had undertaken to sell ladies' hats in the principal department store of the city, and would I please have the kind amiability to hunt him up there? This reads like rank heresy, yet it was strictly true. First contact in Dresden with Fritz Busch, coming guest conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, was in the modiste department of Renner's large mercantile establishment on the Altmarkt, where the genial conductor was busily engaged (along with many other musical and theatrical notables of Dresden) with trying to tempt prospective customers into parting with substantial amounts of money in return for merchandise, made doubly attractive for these hero-worshipers by the addition of an autographed photograph with "each and every" purchase!

An unusual opportunity to observe and study Fritz Busch in his true métier came a couple of days later. Arriving at the opera house at 10 in the morning, I found a symphonic rehearsal in full swing; the youthful, energetic Generalmusikdirektor [illegible] lecturing his men vigorously as he led them through the five movements of Schumann's C major symphony.

"Give me a more dramatic [illegible] quality! * * * Herr X., I've just tossed you that low D, and you're staring at the wall! * * * Smile, this * * * tempo, tempo! * * * Now, let's start the coda over again. Where's the initial? Ach Gott, never seem to have any initials. Well, here it is; let's go. * * * Ah, that's better! Every one follow his first desks * * * (during a difficult cadenza for the flute). Well, Herr Z., are you going to make it? Perhaps it's a bit too difficult? * * * Bravo! Ausgezeichnet!" And a broad smile of satisfaction lit up his youthful features as he brought the masterpiece to its conclusion. Josef Dichtbrowen's new pianoforte concerto, played by the composer himself, came next, and this was followed by Robert Volkmann's overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III," whereupon the Herr Generalmusikdirektor announced "Schluss" and dismissed his little symphonic army until evening, when he was again to lead them, this time in a performance of "The Marriage of Figaro."

Besides his multitudinous duties in connection with the production and conducting of operas at Dresden, Herr Busch this season is offering his subscribers a series of twelve unusually ambitious symphony concerts in which nine novelties (one a "first time anywhere") are announced for presentation. In order that New York music lovers may obtain an advance idea of the selective taste of their new guest conductor, here is a complete list of the works he is offering his Dresden subscribers during the current season. The novelties are listed first:

K. Striegler, symphony in G major, with final chorus.....First time anywhere, on Feb. 22, 23
Iasal Dobrowen, pianoforte concerto, G sharp minor.....First time Dresden
Paul Hindemith, concerto for [illegible].....First time Dresden
Alfredo Casella, partita for pianoforte and orchestra.....First time Dresden
Wi von Baussnern, Symphony No. 4.....First time Dresden
D. F. Tovey, symphony, D major.....First time Dresden
Hans Pfitzner, violin concerto.....First time Dresden
Alma Moodie, soloist.
Igor Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps".....First time Dresden
Gustav Holst, "The Planets."
(Walter Gieseking was the soloist in the Casella partita.)
Beethoven, Leonore Overture No. 3.
Haydn, violoncello concerto, D major.
Beethoven, Symphony, "La Mid[illegible]."
Wagner, variations and fugue on a theme by Handel.
Volkmann, overture to "Richard III."
Schumann (Robert), Symphony No. 1.
Schumann (Georg), variations on a Bach theme.
Mendelssohn, overture, scherzo and [illegible] from "A Midsummer Night's Dream."
Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."
Wagner, a festival overture.
Brahms, Symphony No. 1; Piano[illegible] certo No. 2.
Mozart, concertante symphony for violin, clarinet, bassoon and horn, with orchestra; G major symphony; requiem D minor.
Bruckner, Symphony No. 4.
Cerelli (Arcangelo), Christmas concerto for two violins; solo 'cello and string quartet.
Spohr, nocturne for harmony and "[illegible]ren" music.
Dvorak, violin concerto.
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4; [illegible] certo.
Liszt, a Faust symphony (soloist, Olga Taucher).

It is to be especially noted that among the composers listed only three, Haydn, Brahms, Mozart and Tchaikovsky, are down for more than one work each, and that Herr Busch is neglecting Beethoven almost entirely during the season which commemorates his one-hundredth death day. However, Dresden is to have a Beethoven observance next March, lending character to the observances planned for other prominent music centers the world over.

That Fritz Busch succeeds in accomplishing as much as he does in Dresden stands exceedingly to his credit, when one considers the fact that his medium of expression is one of those combination opera and symphonic orchestras so common in one part of Europe. That the men should stagnate under competitionless rule is to be expected, and one of the most heartbreaking tasks of the conductor is to maintain a workable esprit de corps. Busch, with his youthful cheerlessness, manages to bring this wonder about; but even so, his orchestra cannot be rated as first class [illegible] as the interpretation of symphonic music is concerned. The pace is too strenuous. The performance of "Figaro" which followed the rehearsal above described offered eloquent proof of this fact. The men were tired, and the entire ensemble let down accordingly. When the Herr Generalmusikdirektor of Dresden arrives in New York he will doubtless be overwhelmed with pleased surprise to be able to work with an orchestra which [illegible] solely as a symphonic body, [illegible] pered by operatic duties, he can devote all of his zestful energy into the musical task before him—which means, to maintain the highest possible quality of interpretation. H. C. [illegible]

The Hungarian musician Alexander Laszlo, who has striven to find the connecting link between color and sound, is making a tour of Germany with his color-organ. The Berlin audience admired the beautiful color combinations and forms, but were not convinced that the musician had discovered the real relations between the two arts. Mr. Laszlo will undertake a tour of Switzerland, Italy and France, eighty concerts in all, in 1927. He has been engaged by the German Theatre at Magdeburg for next Summer.

Otto Klemperer, Bruno Walter, Fritz Stiedry, Erich Kleiber and Georg Brecher have been engaged to conduct the Moscow Russian State Philharmonic Orchestra of Moscow.

A Württemberger Bruckner Union has been formed at Stuttgart.

The City of Munich has invited the Neue Bach Verein to hold its Bach festival in Munich.

MARGARETE DESSOFF AND HER WORK AS CHORAL INTERPRETER

Woman Conductor to Appear With Schola Cantorum as First Guest Leader

THE two concerts to be given by the Schola Cantorum this season in Carnegie Hall will introduce guest conductors in the persons of Margarete Dessoff and Hugh Ross. Miss Dessoff, who directs the concert of Christmas week, will be the first woman conductor to have appeared in this city at the head of one of its major musical organizations. She has made an exceptional reputation for herself as a choral conductor in Germany. When she first appeared there at the head of a women's chorus she encountered a conservatism and disapproval of such feminist activity that will not confront her here; but Miss Dessoff has to meet other problems caused by special conditions that no one individual can change. She is a musician of exceptional qualifications; she brings to her work a high and unsparing idealism.

Margarete Dessoff is the daughter of the late Felix Otto Dessoff, teacher of Mottl, Nikisch, Gericke and others who became famous; conductor of the Royal Opera and Philharmonic in Vienna for fifteen years; an intimate friend of Brahms, a powerful propagandist for all he considered good in music, and one of the leading figures of a memorable musical period. Miss Dessoff is of artistic descent on both sides of her family. She grew up amid the cultural and musical activities which clustered about her father. He was opposed to any of his children following a musical career; least of all would he have countenanced his daughter becoming a choral director. But Margarete Dessoff was given piano lessons; she listened to the performances that her father directed; she came in close contact with leading composers and performers of Vienna at its zenith; and, once in a while, in spite of her father's prejudices and preoccupations, she obtained from him counsel in her studies.

When Miss Dessoff was 18 years old her father died. This was in 1892. She studied the piano and voice for ten years, and a year after the death of her father began to teach. One of her ideas about teaching was that ensemble singing—a cappella—was extremely important and beneficial for students. She combined her pupils in an ensemble group, which grew in numbers and musical proficiency. She gave concerts, at first of an unpretentious nature, which became quickly popular. She soon gained the interest and warm approval of Siegfried Ochs, the German choral leader.

The day came when Miss Dessoff's chorus was invited to visit Wiesbaden and perform there for one of the concerts of the Brahms Festival of 1912. For the young woman conductor the atmosphere was at the beginning very chilly, heavy with hostility and disapproval; but after the first performance there was no question of the impression her chorus had made.

This concert was the first of many rapid steps in advance. The chorus appeared at the Brahms festival of 1917, when Arthur Nikisch was the leading conductor. It received the warm praise of other conductors. Its fame constantly grew. Miss Dessoff became leader of the chorus of the Bachgemeinde in Frankfort and of her own Madrigal Ensemble, which, when the war broke out had become known over Germany. She came to America in 1923, looking for a fresh field for her work. She has pursued that work at the Institute of Musical Art and in other modest ways hereabouts. Gradually its import has grown on those who came in contact with it, and the engagement to direct the coming concert is the result of the growing effect of her efforts in this city.

Miss Dessoff was asked whether she experienced any greater difficulties in maintaining discipline and industry on the parts of her chorus singers than she did in developing her standards in Germany.

"Are not the conditions in a city where life is so swift and intense as New York, and a community which forgets more and more how to sing, and has apparently lost the desire to sing, very destructive to choral rehearsal and interpretation? Don't forget the effect on minds of our mechanical musical instruments. They certainly tend to discourage or distract those who otherwise would be inclined to meet and sing for the pleasure and self-expression of doing so."

"I will tell you this," Miss Dessoff replied; "the hurry which it is traditional for the foreign visitor to notice and expatiate upon, and to which the American refers rather complacently as a curse of his existence, is largely a state of mind. The life in a modern European city is just as difficult as in that of an American centre, and it is harder to make a living. But people find time there for the higher satisfactions of existence; they lighten their burdens by contact with art, and look upon art as an essential and indispensable part of their lives.

"I think people in America have the disposition to do the same thing, but there are sometimes distractions and a lack of direction. I have always impressed it upon my singers that unless their work is something serious and valuable to them they would better not undertake it. I have followed the same rule here and the response is generous.

"I do not believe that chorus singing of a high order can ever come on a basis of profit or professionalism. I am in no sense against the professional singer and his valuable art. But choral performance should embrace as well singers not musicians by profession, it should summon executants from every occupation and rank of society, and these people must realize what it means to sing, to feel and interpret great music, to escape from the ugly and commonplace things of life and create beauty together.

"This may sound to you impracticable. But it is not. I have never contented myself by training musicians how to sing notes! There is too much that is note-perfect and too little that expresses feeling. Particularly in countries where self-control and the concealment of all feeling are inculcated is it difficult to make people realise that music is a release and a fulfillment. Life entails restrictions and sacrifices; art is the realization of visions and needs that every one knows, if only he would heed them. There are a great many musical executants who think that by the act of performance they become musicians. They are wrong. The notes are the outside and in themselves empty symbols of the composer's meaning. To make a chorus feel the dynamic power or the evocative beauty of a word, to make them understand a musical work from the standpoint of the composer rather than that of mere purveyors of other people's ideas is hard. It requires energy, faith, persistence of the conductor. But it can be done. It is done by all who have conviction and conscience in their labors.

"A conductor must constantly fight complacency in any form that confronts him. He must stimulate the imagination and correlate the composition with the principles which are fundamental to all art. We rehearse, for example, a Brahms motet. I ask the chorus, 'Do you know the last movement of the Fourth Symphony? Do you know the development of the passacaglia theme? Do you see the relation between the Fourth Symphony style and the style of the music you have before you?' I ask them to notice the appearance and working out of a motive. They must understand what the composer means and see his work as a complete structure instead of something in which they have a small and isolated part. You think this is a great deal to ask of the average chorus singer. It is, but it is the real way and the successful way to interest musicians in their work and secure from them vital and significant performances.

"The influences against this kind of choral work in modern life are, of course, many. Speed, luxury, mass production and all these things are against individual inner development. Another great enemy of the inspiration and the solace which comes in a rare degree from intelligent and earnest chorus singing is the sensationalism to which all publics are prey, and particularly the institution that has arisen in modern times—that of the guest conductor.

"Yes! I am against the guest conductor, even though I am occupying exactly that position in the near future." Miss Dessoff laughed. "The great orchestras and, indeed, all musical organizations of a permanent kind should have permanent conductors. It is bad for all concerned when it is otherwise. The musicians and conductors have only become accustomed to each other when they part. The advent of the new conductor is confusing. The press naturally gives special attention to each new conductor. Personalities, &c., are compared. Under these circumstances it is not more than human that rivalry, open or secret, should develop between conductors, and that each conductor, while in office, should try feverishly, in a way destructive of his best work, to equal or surpass, in those things which mean public success, his colleague.

"And there should be more reliance upon great music and less upon the exciting 'novelty' of the day. I believe that those who make and listen to music should be progressive, always curious of what is new, but judicial in valuing and performing it. A new work is not considered of lasting value but is 'interesting' and is therefore produced. I do not particularly like that word 'interesting.' If you examine my programs given in Germany you will find them covering many centuries and inclusive of music by composers of today. But I admit that I am cautious in approaching any piece of music, old or new, for performance. I have spent much time in research in this direction, particularly in the matter of music for women's voices, and there is so much that is good and needs to be known and made familiar that I am rather indisposed to spend too much time in the preparation of a work to be performed once or twice and then forgotten. People need, above all things, to live with great music. The purpose of chorus singing, in particular, is to communicate and share its beauty, each individual expressing himself, as it were, anonymously, but gaining, not losing, in his creative and expressive power through the rapport and cooperation of his fellow-artists."

A PREMIERE IN ROCHESTER

THE Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, under the baton of Conductor Eugene Goossens, gave the first American performance of Leo Weiner's concertino for piano and orchestra Dec. 2. Sandor Vas of the Eastman School of Music Faculty was the soloist. "To the agreeable surprise of more than one listener," wrote A. J. Warner in The Times-Union, "Mr. Weiner's work turned out to consist of music not only easy to hear, but that was charming as well. Music suggestive of Hungarian folk tunes and dances; music that in addition to being redolent of the national spirit of that colorful land is finely written in regard to form and technical skill. In the first of the two movements there is a lovely and haunting theme; the second is a gay and flowing scherzo, elaborately developed harmonically. Mr. Vas, who is a close personal friend of the composer, gave a brilliant musical performance of the piano part, playing it 'con amore.' He was heard with a degree of pleasure that won him an ovation, which he shared with Mr. Goossens, whose talent for accompanying was delightfully illustrated in the sympathetic orchestral contribution to the première."

WARSAW CHOPIN MEMORIAL

A MEMORIAL statue of Chopin by the sculptor Szymanowski was unveiled by the President of the Polish Republic, amid general rejoicings, at Warsaw, Nov. 14. Every country in Europe sent delegates; France was represented by Paul Vidal, Georges Hué and M. Barbédienne, the French biographer of Chopin; Germany by Adolf Weissmann and Herr Kempff; Belgium by Emile Bosquet; Lauber de Rougemont (Switzerland); Edward Järnefelt (Sweden), and Erkki Melartin (Finland). After a banquet by the Foreign Office a special Chopin concert took place at the Philharmonic. In the evening a gala performance was given at the opera. The second act of Moniuszko's opera, "The Haunted Castle," was followed by "Pan Twardowski," a ballet by the Polish composer Rozycki; Emil Mlynarski conducted. The Chopin festival coincided with the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra. The jubilee concert lasted three hours, under the direction of Emil Mlynarski and Gregor Fittelberg.

A program of Polish music included a symphony with baritone solo by Carol Szymanowski.

CONCERTS OF HOLIDAY SEASON BEGIN

PROGRAMS OF A WEEK

Philharmonic Play for Pension Fund—"Mme. Angot" at Jolson's

MARKING time till New York's gala holiday season, when a host of special events are planned, there are eight opera performances at the Metropolitan from now to Christmas, fewer orchestral events of first class and the smallest number of solo recitals for any one week of the active musical season.

Tonight's opera concert has Toscha Seidel, the violinist, as guest. Ten singers in the bill are Mmes. Mario, Dalossy, Alcock and Anthony, Messrs. Taucher, Tokatyan and Tedesco, Tibbett, Picco and Didur.

Operas and casts for the eighth week follow:

Cavalleria Rusticana and Lucia di Lammermoor, special Monday matinee. The former sung by Mmes. Rosa Ponselle, Alcock and Mattfeld, Messrs. Tokatyan and Picco, Mr. Bellezza conducting; the latter Mmes. Talley and Wakefield, Messrs. Gigli, Basiola, Pinza, Tedesco and Paltrinieri, Mr. Bamboschek conducting.

Jewels of the Madonna, Monday evening. Mmes. Jeritza, Bourskaya, Anthony, Ryan and Bonetti; Messrs. Martinelli, Danise, Bada, Paltrinieri and Altglass. [illegible] Bellezza.

Lohengrin, Wednesday evening. Mmes. Rethberg and Matzenauer, Messrs. Laubenthal, Whitehill, Bender and Tibbett. Conductor, Bodanzky.

Gioconda, Thursday evening. Mmes. Rosa Ponselle, Alcock and Wakefield; Messrs. Gigli, Ruffo, Pinza, d'Angelo, Paltrinieri and Reschiglian. Conductor, Serafin.

Faust, Friday evening. Mmes. Alda, Howard and Dalossy; Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Basiola, Chaliapin and Wolfe. Conductor, Hasselmans.

Die Walkuere, Christmas Day matinee. Mmes. Jeritza, Easton, Telva, Howard, Wakefield, Fleischer, Ryan, Rosserler, [illegible] and Anthony; Messrs. Taucher, [illegible] and Gustafsen. Conductor, Bodanzky.

Forza del Destino, Saturday night. Mmes. Rosa Ponselle, Bourskaya and Flexer; Messrs. Martinelli, Danise, Pinza, Paltrinieri, Tibbett, Ananian and d'Angelo. Conductor, Bellezza.

Don Quichotte, Tuesday evening, at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. Mmes. Telva, Anthony and Egener; Messrs. Chaliapin, de Luca, Meader, Bada, Reschiglian, Gabor, d'Angelo, Ananian and Wolfe. Conductor, Hasselmans.

REVIVE "MADAME ANGOT."

La Fille de Mme. Angot, fourth revival by the French Opera Comique Company, tomorrow night at Jolson's Theatre.

This week's revival is cast as follows: Mlle. Lange, Mlle. Alny; Clairette Angot, Mlle. Bruard; Amarante, Mlle. Merseau; Ange Pitou, M. Hirigaray; Pomponnet, M. Foix; Larivaudiere, M. Servatius; Louchard, M. Delmarche; Trenitz, M. Maquaire; Cadet, M. Tonso; Guillaume, M. Grandais; Herselle, Mlle. Achart; Cydalise, Mlle. Briere; Delaunay, Mlle. Narcisse; Babet, Mlle. Steichen.

Charles Lecocq's most famous opera bouffe, with French text, in three acts, by Girardin, Clairville and Koenig, was first produced at Brussels in November, 1872. It was sung in New York by the Maurice Grau French Opera Company at the Casino in 1883, the cast headed by Mme. Theo and Victor Capoul. A later cast at the Casino, singing in English, had a run of sixty-one nights. With Camille d'Arville and Marie Halton, the artists were Eva Davenport, Grace Golden, Ida Johns, Lizzie Leoni, Florence Bell, Drew Donaldson, Fred Solomon, Henry Hallam, Charles H. Drew, Max Lube, A. W. Maflin, George Olmi, A. W. Tams and Henry Leoni.

The opera's scene opens in a market place of Paris in 1797, the period of the Directoire ruled by Barras. Here Clairette, daughter of the late Mme. Angot, is to be married to Pomponnet, a hairdresser, though she loves the song writer Ange Pitou. To postpone her marriage, she sings the poet's song attacking Mlle. Lange, the actress favorite of Barras, knowing it will cause instant arrest.

Mlle. Lange in her drawing room, in Act II, sends for the prisoner, finds in her an old school friend and promises she shall wed whom she pleases. Ange Pitou, also present, stirs the jealousy of Lange's rival admirer, Larivaudiere. Pomponnet is arrested for having a copy of the song. There is a raid by political conspirators. The two women fall their love for the poet during a dance.

Clairette, released, forges three letters to Ange Pitou, Mlle. Lange and Larivaudiere for a rendezvous at an open-air ball at Belleville. Their encounter and the arrival of the market people leads to a reconciliation of the actress and Clairette, who decides to give up her fickle poet for the faithful Pomponnet.

CONCERTS TODAY.

SATURDAY.

Christmas Day, when not a creature is stirring in New York's many concert halls. The music of the day will be that of countless celebrations in homes and churches, with the exception of the regular subscription matinee and night performances at the Metropolitan Opera.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

Felix Warburg's recent provision of Stradivarius instruments for the Musical Art Quartet, following a princely custom of Old World musicians before Haydn and Mozart, will be shown to the public at the next concert of these young players on Dec. 30 in Aeolian Hall. The first violin of Mr. Warburg's "Strad family" is the famous "Titian Strad," to buy which Efrem Zimbalist once made a special trip to London.

The Flonzaley Quartet and Ernest Hutcheson, pianist, have been engaged for a performance of the Schumann Quintet to be broadcast from Station WEAF on Jan. 11. They will be heard in the Everready Hour, which is scheduled from 9 to 10 in the evening.

The New York Flute Club will hold its regular monthly meeting today at the Art Centre, 65 East Fifty-sixth Street. The club, now in its seventh successful season, has been organized "to promote interest in the most beautiful of instruments, so that it shall attain the popularity which it rightly deserves."

New York's Music Week Association has announced March 23 as the date for its gold medal winners' concert to be given in Carnegie Hall. Rehearsals for the junior and senior string ensembles which will appear on that occasion are now under way, under the direction of Max Bendix and Henry Burck.

A new string quartet by Wesley La Violette of the Chicago Musical College will have its first performance this month in a program of the Hart House String Quartet at the Goodman Theatre in Chicago.

The London String Quartet has been booked to appear Jan. 31 with the Music Club at Galveston, Texas.

OTHERS TO BE HEARD.

Marie Sundelius, Cecilia Loftus, Marion Greer and Boris Lang are the artists in tonight's third program at John Murray Anderson's Park Avenue Theatre.

David and Clara Mannes play three sonatas of Beethoven's Opus 30 at their third private recital today at the Mannes School.

Beethoven's "Fidelio," promised at the Metropolitan, will close the Misses Levy and Lambert's opera recitals at the Plaza on Tuesday.

Charlotte Lund is preparing a version of Deems Taylor's "The King's Henchman" for her Princess Theatre recitals before the Metropolitan premiere.

Barbara Fisher, soprano, and Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, appear tonight at the Educational Alliance.

FREE TO THE PUBLIC.

Samuel Baldwin at the City College today and Wednesday gives the last of his free organ recitals until Jan. 9. In this afternoon's program are Bach's G minor fugue, part of Grieg's "Peer Gynt" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

Lynnwood Farnam tomorrow at Holy Communion Church will play organ works of T. F. Candlyn, Bruce Simonds, Karg Elert, Howard Hanson and Honegger.

Mr. Baldwin next Wednesday at the City College plays d'Aquin's "Noel," Bach's "St. Ann's Fugue" and the Largo from Dvorak's "New World."

Handel's "Messiah" will be sung by Dr. William C. Carl's choir on Christmas Eve in the First Presbyterian Church, Fifth Avenue.

The Metropolitan Art Museum's free orchestral concerts will be resumed on Jan. 8, continuing through that month and again in March.

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The Central Glee Club of 100 male voices under A. Y. Cornell will be heard Monday evening at Brooklyn's Central Branch Y. M. C. A. Assisting soloists are Grace Kerns, soprano, and Hyman Piston, violin.

The Tollefsen Trio is announced in a chamber music concert at the Jamaica branch of the Brooklyn Institute on Tuesday evening.

PLANS OF MUSICIANS.

Gregory Matusewitch, playing the English concertina, will share a Town Hall program next Sunday with Leon Cortilli, tenor.

Michael O'Halloran, an Irish-American baritone, is announced in a début recital on Dec. 27 at Aeolian Hall.

Sylvia Lent will play Vaughan Williams's "The Lark Ascending" at her violin recital on Dec. 28 at the Town Hall.

Gertrude Bonime is to give a piano recital at Aeolian Hall on Wednesday evening, Dec. 29.

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

Jean Sibelius's symphonic poem "Tapiola," the first of the new works commissioned by the New York Symphony Society for this season, will be performed in Mecca Auditorium next Sunday afternoon. The title refers to the wild northern forest of Finland, "wherein dwell the god of the forest and his wood nymphs."

George Gershwin reappears with the Symphony Society next Sunday as soloist for his "Concerto in F," which was first performed last season. The work is repeated this year by popular request. Mr. Damrosch will open the program with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Efrem Zimbalist will again be the Philharmonic's soloist next Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, playing the Glazounow concerto. The program opens with the Glinka overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" and closes with the Fifth Symphony of Mahler.

Georges Georgesco, who makes a delayed bow at Tuesday's Philharmonic concert with Mengelberg and McCormack, is director of the Rumanian National Opera and the Philharmonic Orchestra of Bucharest. He began his career as a 'cellist with the Quartet Marteau.

Dusolina Giannini, returning this week from her European tour, will appear Dec. 30 in Carnegie Hall with the New York Symphony. She will sing Elizabeth's "Prayer" from "Tannhäuser" and an air from Tchaikovsky's "Jeanne d'Arc."

The Cleveland Orchestra, under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff, will give its only New York concert this season on Jan. 18 at Carnegie Hall.

Arcadie Birkenholz, violinist, will be soloist with the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 16 in Baltimore.

HOSTS JOIN IN CAROLS

Holiday Songs Afield—Miss d'Aranyi's Tour—Notes Abroad

ORGANIZED associations formed for the special purpose are planning Christmas caroling in the big cities during the holidays. The St. Louis Christmas Carols Association is advocating the "Learn a Carol a Day" idea in the newspapers. A group committee composed of six persons in each section of the city is responsible for the formation of a special group of carolers that is to sing in an assigned district. Another feature will be the institutional caroling provided by the Girl Scouts, Campfire Girls and Girl Reserves. Groups of singers in the standard caroler's costume will sing in the noonday clubs, restaurants and hotels. Pageantry and caroling by colored and foreign groups complete the program.

Playground and recreation centres are to be the scene of neighborhood caroling programs at Los Angeles under the direction of the city's playground and recreation department. There will be central Christmas programs at Westlake Park and the Public Library. Numerous church choirs and soloists are cooperating in the singing, which will be broadcast by radio. Community programs of a similar nature are to be organized in outlying residential sections.

From 4,000 to 6,000 singers are to be organized at Denver in units ranging from quartets to choruses of more than one hundred. These will sing in the principal centres, such as the hotels, community centres, neighborhood houses, the civic centre, and in all the downtown stores. The Denver Music Week Association acts as a clearing house to allocate territory to the various caroling groups.

The Utica Symphony Orchestra, directed by Edgar J. Alderwick, gave the second concert of its season before a capacity audience in the Avon Theatre, Dec. 11. The outstanding scores on the program were: Weber's "Overture to Oberon," Bantock's "Scenes from the Scottish Highlands," "Excerpts from the Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz and the "Rumanian Rhapsody" in A major, Opus 11, No. 1. The third concert of the series, planned for 1926-1927, will be given some time in January.

Jelly d'Aranyi, whose successes in Europe have preceded her to this country, will arrive in New York in November, 1927, and not earlier, as previously stated.

"THE GOLDEN CAGE."

"The Golden Cage," a play arranged from the poems of William Blake by Mrs. Clarence Bishop Smith, with orchestral music by Arthur Whiting, will be given Christmas season performances on the afternoon and evening of Dec. 26 in the Hampden Theatre. The performances will be directed by Edith King and Dorothy Coit. "The Golden Cage" was first performed at Pittsfield, Mass., on Sept. 12 last. It is an allegorical fantasy for which Mr. Whiting has written fanciful music. Play and music were warmly praised on the occasion of the initial performance.

MUSIC NOTES ABROAD.

DR. JEAN SIBELIUS, the Finnish composer, has been elected a member of the Incorporated Society of British Authors, Playwrights and Composers.

Sir Walford Davies has been elected President of the Incorporated Society of Musicians for the coming year, and Dr. G. H. Smith of Hull Vice President. Professor Granville Bantock and Tobias Matthay have been made members.

Sir Richard Paget gave demonstrations of the ways by which he succeeded in simulating the human voice by mechanical means at the Regent Street Polytechnic Nov. 19. During an illness Sir Richard Paget amused himself by listening to the vowel sounds produced by his own voice and discovered that each vowel sound consisted of two resonances. Afterward he verified this by constructing models in plasticine, and later he read a paper to the Royal Society on his discovery. At the lecture, which was in aid of King Edward's Hospital Fund for London, Sir Richard Paget manipulated some of his models, which included those of the mouth cavity with tongue and lips and an artificial larynx. The lecturer showed how the two hands could be used instead of the mouth so as to produce complete sentences, three fingers of one hand being moved to represent the tongue, while two fingers of the other hand took the place of the lips.

The third season of the London Opera Syndicate's International Opera will open at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, May 2, 1927, and close after a run of eight weeks on June 24. The principal conductors will be Bruno Walter and Vincenzo Bellezza.

It is possible that the British National Opera Company may receive a substantial yearly payment from broadcasting sources, which will insure its financial stability. The sum mentioned and hoped for is between £20,000 and £30,000 annually.

The South London Choral Association, the oldest choral society in the metropolis, has been forced to disband.

The Selection Committee, or jury, which chooses the programs of the International Festival of Contemporary Music will meet in London for the first time Jan. 8 to 10. It will consider works sent in by national committees of sixteen or more countries. Sir Henry Wood, who was selected as a juror, will be unable to serve owing to his absence from England at the time of the meetings.

His place will be taken by Louis Gruenberg, U. S. A. The other members of the jury are Walter Straram, Paris; Alois Haba, Prague; Rudolf Simonsen, Copenhagen, and Philipp Jarnach, Berlin. These musicians will be the guests of the Contemporary Music Centre.

"Deirdre in Exile," an opera by Fritz Hart, was produced in Melbourne by the composer, who was also his own librettist. Fritz Hart composed eleven operas before "Deirdre in Exile."

The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Wilhelm Furtwängler, will give a series of concerts in England.

The London Grand Opera Syndicate announced that grand opera is almost a financial success in London. The syndicate stated that its loss on its 1926 season was only half that made in 1925, which in turn was only half that of 1924. If the boxes in Covent Garden Opera House were fully subscribed for, said the syndicate, opera would at last be a commercial proposition in London. Among the operas to be produced next season will be "Turandot," "Les Huguenots" and "Il Seraglio."

Eugene Goossens has written incidental music for a piece founded on Margaret Kennedy's "Constant Nymph."

Albert Coates will direct all the performances of "Parsifal" that will be given by the British National Opera Company.

Events in Central Europe.

Julian Krein, a 13-year-old prodigy, has made his appearance in Vienna. His father and uncle are the Russian contemporary composers Gregory and Alexander Krein. Julian, who was born in Moscow in 1913, began to show talent at the age of 5. His first compositions were written when he was eight. Since then he has composed a symphony, a suite for chamber orchestra (which will be played in Russia and Vienna), a string quartet, two pianoforte sonatas and a large number of compositions for the piano and for the violin.

The Burgomaster of Zwickau has acquired 1,250 manuscripts, letters, programs, photos, &c., of Robert Schumann, which were once the property of his oldest daughter, Marie Schumann, at Interlaken.

The City of Marienbad has placed a memorial tablet on the house in which Bruckner stayed in 1873, and where he completed his Third Symphony.

The Amsterdam Concertgebouw, directed by Willem Mengelberg, will give concerts at the Geneva International Exposition of Music, which will be held from May 21 to June 6, 1927.

Willem Pyper, the Dutch composer, dedicated his Third Symphony to Pierre Monteux, who directed its first performance with the Concertgebouw Orchestra.

Richard Strauss has finished his lyric work, "Helen in Egypt." It will be given its première during the season of 1927-28.

The City of Vienna is planning to hold a Choral Festival in 1928; 100,000 singers from two continents will be invited to take part.

Dr. Otto Erich Deutsch of Vienna has calculated the amount of money Franz Schubert received for his compositions between 1814 and 1828. He believes that it amounted to 11,488 marks.

Schönberg has requested the committee of the International Society for Contemporary Music to erase his name from the list of honorary members.

The Ministry of Arts has officially announced the nomination of Heinz Tietjens, Intendant of the Berlin Stadtsoper, to be general Intendant of the Prussian Staatsoper in Berlin, and the State Theatres of Cassel and Wiesbaden. Dr. Ludwig Horth remains director of the Opera House Unter den Linden, and Otto Klemperer director of the Staatsoper on the Platz der Republic at Berlin.

Joseph Krips, who succeeded the late Ferdinand Wagner as music director at Karlsruhe, will direct the next Baden-Baden Festival.

BEST MEDIUM FOR QUICK RESULTS

The New York Times:

Our advertisement in The New York Times Business Page under "Offerings to Buyers" has brought us wonderful results and is continuing to bring new outlets for Crompton Fabrics.

Although in our little advertisement we have specified velvetcens and printed velvetcens, inquiries have led our salesmen to follow up these accounts, which has brought additional business for our other fabrics.

Oftentimes we recommend our manufacturers to use the "Offerings to Buyers" columns when they have merchandise they wish to dispose of, as we find this is the best medium for quick results.

MUSICAL EVENTS AFIELD—LOCAL ART NOTES

TWO VIEWS OF BEECHAM

Sir Thomas's Countrymen Compare Music in England and America

SIR THOMAS BEECHAM'S recent denunciation of musical conditions in England has called forth some replies in rebuttal. Stephen Sherwood voices his opinion, somewhat insular in tone, in the December Sackbut:

"There is always something pleasantly dramatic and even melodramatic about being cursed, and something a little heroic about being insulted and scorned. When, therefore, Sir Thomas Beecham pauses on the gangway of a Cunarder to curse us with bell, book and candle, to call us fools and Philistines, we react mentally by feeling both hurt and noble. The gangway of a Cunarder is metaphorical, for, in strict verity, Sir Thomas is enduring life among us for twelve dreary months more before he takes up his duties as guest-conductor to an orchestra in Philadelphia, never to return.

"His chief anger, be it observed, is with the fact that the British Broadcasting Company has settled down comfortably under the wing of the Government and that the State, which has done nothing for the art of music other than impose the iniquity of the entertainment tax, should subsidize this method of reproduction. * * * Let us admit that nobody has more right to be angry than Sir Thomas. He has given his life-work and his fortune for British music, and if there had been any hope of our appreciating opera as an art, as distinct from a dress parade and social occasion, it would have been largely owing to his indefatigable work on its behalf. If we had been as a State in the habit of granting subsidies, or could ever conceive of anything to do with the theatre without the subconsciousness of dabbling in original sin, Beecham's opera would have commanded that subsidy. * * *

"His remedy and his instance are another matter. His last and United States may prove worse than the first. All of us know how much workers in any form of art owe to Americans, since the vastness of individual riches and general prosperity has made Americans the only patrons of the arts who can afford to patronize them. But whether the understanding and appreciation of music and art in any general way is better than here is surely a moot point. Sir Thomas may only be exchanging Babel for Babbitt. * * * Sir Thomas has every right to sell his services to the highest bidder; but these proceedings are rather cause for apology than abuse. Were he packing his bag for Moscow, where the State endows art fully and the workers, even when they are desperately poor, attend the State-controlled opera; were he en route for Munich and Prague, his protests would have won more weight with us. America smacks a little of the fleshpots of Egypt, and it would be well for Sir Thomas to decide whether his wrath is really at the emptiness of our heads or our purses.

"One thing at least is certain: America has more broadcasting and, from his viewpoint, worse. While we listen-in to Mozart, they listen-in to murder trials. * * * If there is one country in the world which is machine-minded it is surely America. America, therefore, seems no place for a sensitive artist, unless he is going to concentrate on the cultured minority, as an artist must do here. Broadcasting and the gramophone have come to stay. Whether we will or not, we belong to the first century B. C., and these very early years of experiment have been years of continuous improvement. * * * Infinitely more people are hearing infinitely more music than ever before.

"Sir Thomas will forgive us if, when he shakes the dust off his feet against us, we take care he does not throw it in our eyes. That he has stood so long in the forefront of that fight to better the musical conditions in this country earns him the right to retire from it; but when he turns his valedictions into maledictions he must write it down to our charity that we prefer to think of the far, far better things he has done for the art."

By Way of Rejoinder.

FRANCIS TOYE, in The London Morning Post, adds some reflections on the present state of music in England: "Presuming, as I think we can, that the problem of the Queen's Hall is soluble on some such lines as those indicated last week, what then? It is no use having a hall for important music if there is no important music to put in it. While not sharing the complete pessimism of Sir Thomas Beecham as to the future, or, if it comes to that, the present, state of English music, it is extremely difficult to feel cheerful about the matter.

"The standard of performances is, I fear, definitely lower than it used to be; expenses of orchestral concerts—which remain, all things said and done, the very backbone of modern music—have increased out of all proportion to possible receipts; attendances seem to be noticeably less good, though I am open to correction on this point, not having any figures to guide me. * * *

"The whole organization of music in London seems to me faulty from top to bottom. Our musical arrangements are still conducted on pre-war lines; they have not adapted themselves to modern conditions—as have, perforce, our great industries. * * *

"We are always waiting for patrons, large or small, generous or stingy. * * * However, the race of musical patrons is dead, in Europe at any rate, and in England it never existed.

"Nowadays we can legitimately plead poverty, but we were not always poor. Were there no rich men in England before 1014 able and willing to emulate the public spirit of their colleagues in the United States? You may find the American point of view unsympathetic generally, but in this particular the American millionaires, and, for the matter of that, the American well-to-do citizens as a body, have served and are serving their country better in the days of her prosperity than did our rich men in the days of England's prosperity.

"Whatever economic crises may overtake the United States in the future, the great orchestras and music colleges are there, and there for good, properly endowed, properly equipped. We might have been equally fortunate had thought been taken in time. The debt of gratitude that even English science and English art now owe to men like Rockefeller and Carnegie can hardly be a source of pride to patriotic Englishmen who do not think of their country exclusively in terms of the golf course and the racing stable."

A Spokesman for Scriabin.

"THE art of Scriabin," says Boris de Schloezer in The Sackbut, "does not 'catch on' in Paris; it is dying out. This is an extremely significant fact. His art, indeed, seems to me essentially revolutionary; the opposition to its promulgation shown in French musical circles (the masses would end by accepting him, if one insisted) originates in a sort of vague presentiment of the explosive power of Scriabinism and of its anti-European spirit. Though we know little of the man, we divine that he is an enemy. The repugnance is instinctive, though good reasons are not backing to explain it afterward and give it a firm basis: e. g., it is said that Scriabin invented nothing, that he borrowed from Liszt and Chopin, that he is a belated Wagnerian, in a word, a 'romantic'—the worst of all insults nowadays. People do not want to listen to him, because they are vaguely conscious of danger. Nor are they wrong. From this point of view, the reason why Paris obstinately rejects Scriabin, while London and Berlin acclaim him, is that France for the past eight years has been a stronghold of the anti-revolutionary spirit.

"But what mean such terms as 'revolutionary' and 'anti-revolutionary' in the world of music? When I say that the work of Scriabin is essentially revolutionary, I do not dream of regarding him as a Bolshevist and comparing his work with that of the Communists. I knew him personally, and I feel certain that he would today have been one of the émigrés, like Prokofieff, and that he would have been an implacable foe of Russian Communism. In claiming Scriabin as a revolutionary, I mean that the spirit animating his work, his tendencies, his conceptions of art and life, the means he used, the objects he pursued—all this was essentially opposed to the spirit of Western art.

"I am aware that this art is not a homogeneous whole, and that between Schönberg and Stravinsky, for instance, a great divergence is noticeable. And yet Scriabin is opposed to both, as also to Ravel and to Fauré. The fact is, their conception of art is quite esthetic, and well within the compass of our culture; they are alike artists and artisans. They create more or less successful works * * * the series extends indefinitely. Now what Scriabin desired was to end this profusion, to close the series, and then create a work filling up the void, one that would fully satisfy all our efforts and desires.

"You see the difference: the artist, as we know him, is in the world of the relative; Scriabin imposes on his art an end absolute in itself. Scriabin pursued his dream during the whole of his life; it animates his art and is the mainspring of his work; it inspires every page he wrote, and, before death came, the composer actually renounced the production of pianoforte and orchestral pieces and gave himself up entirely to his magnum opus, his 'Mystery.' Nothing remains to us of this 'Mystery,' all of whose details Scriabin had settled in theory. All the same, it gave a unique character to his entire musical activity, a special trend, a specific attitude."

Nikolai Orloff, the Russian Pianist, Appearing This Afternoon.

MUSIC EVENTS IN PARIS

PARIS, Dec. 8.

THE Opéra Comique has presented a lyric drama by Gustave Doret, entitled "La Tisseuse d'Orties" ("The Weaver of Nettles"). The critics, in general, were rather severe. To judge this dramatic work with fairness, it must be remembered that it was composed in 1900, and had waited twenty years for the opportunity to be presented. This is somewhat surprising in view of the fact that in that interval the Opéra Comique inflicted innumerable scores far less worthy than this one. The libretto, like the music, evokes ancient memories. They were both written when Maeterlinck and symbolism were still in vogue, in the period of "Pelléas," "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue," and of Magnard's "Guercoeur."

The work is not particularly personal; one finds traces of multiple influences, Chausson, Magnard, above all Dukas, and also sometimes Debussy. The themes are somewhat abstract, and the composer indulges in too many harp arpeggios, while the flute warbles and trills in altissimo and the string quartet or the clarinet sings the principal theme. It is at times the orchestration of Paul Dukas, but extremely simplified. The whole scene of popular revolt strangely recalls a similar scene in "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue," but the music is not symphonically constructed as Dukas does it, and the subject matter is infinitely less rich and precious.

What pleased me in this work was its Swiss side, so to speak. M. Doret, like his librettist, is a Swiss, and in the second act one finds the atmosphere of Alpine landscapes and that sense of mystery which is discovered equally in a writer like Ramuz. "La Tisseuse d'Orties" is far from being a work of art, but it is an interesting lyric drama, full of fresh impressions and of a poetry that is rarely met in the modern theatrical music of France.

It is hoped that the composer with this austere work will again find the success that he once had with his charming "Armaillies."

After a long period of stagnation the Paris concert season is resuming its activities. The Société de Musique Indépendante devoted its 122d concert, on Dec. 3, to a Honegger Festival. This pretentious title was given to a recital of chamber music, a form which plays a secondary rôle among the compositions of Honegger. This musician prefers large choral and instrumental masses to small solo effects. The concert, however, was interesting as it clearly showed the genesis and the evolution of Honegger's talent. In the Rhapsody for two flutes, clarinet and piano, dated April, 1017, the great influence of Debussy over the young pupil from the Paris Conservatoire could be clearly traced. The work is not particularly personal, but nevertheless it is very musical and delicately sensitive. The "Poèmes des Alcools" of G. Apollinaire, which belongs to the same period, showed the influence of Ravel.

The real Honegger appeared in the "Three Counterpoints" for flute, oboe, violin and cello. The polyphony of the last (a "canon to an obstinate bass") is daring. I liked the Sonate for violin, which was very scholastic, though slightly vapid. The piano pieces from the "Cahier Romand" were insignificant, but there were delicious details in the "Pièces brèves," which Mme. Andrée Vaurabourg, the young wife of the composer, played to perfection. The concert ended with the seldom played Sonatine for clarinet and piano. The first part is a little dull, but the second is excellent music, full of vivacity and movement.

The only events of the week, aside from this concert, were the re-appearance of the great Russian pianist, Vladimir Horowitz, and the first audition of a new work by Vincent d'Indy, "Dyptique Méditerranéen," by the Société du Conservatoire, directed by Philippe Gaubert, Dec. 5. Vladimir Horowitz is 23. He is without question the greatest pianist of the rising generation. Berlin critics unanimously hailed him as the successor of Busoni. His first Paris concert last year was a revelation. He has all the technical gifts in addition to an exquisite musical sensitiveness. He excels in the interpretation of Bach and Lizst, but he can play Ravel or Debussy to perfection. From the start this young artist has been classed among the pianists of the first rank; one can only compare him to Paderewski or to Busoni. Those who heard Anton Rubinstein think that they have rediscovered the Russian pianist in Horowitz.

Horowitz is conquering Europe with startling rapidity, without adventitious publicity, for the Russian agency which handles his affairs is very poorly organized in this respect. The tour of Horowitz in Germany was a triumph, and at the Concerts du Conservatoire in Paris he received an endless ovation, in spite of his choice of the locally unpopular Tchaikovsky concerto.

Vincent d'Indy's new symphonic poem, "Dyptique Méditerranéen," will not be counted among his best works. The polyphonic writing is firm and the orchestration, especially in the descriptive passages, is done with rare skill, but the ensemble is very heavy, very weighty, and seems very long. In the first part the composer evokes the dawn of a Summer day. The sun rises and a great wave of lyricism rises towards it from the awakened earth. This sentimental aspect is less happily treated than the more or less impressionistic episodes which describe the effects of light or color. D'Indy is pastmaster in the art of evoking colors through sounds, and he proves this once again. The second part, which suggests the close of day, is slightly monotonous, in spite of many passages of a rich and dazzling instrumentation.

A young Hungarian composer, Melle Ticharich, a pupil of Schreker, gave a concert of her own works at the Salle Gaveau. She has an interesting personality, she has not yet completely thrown off the influence of Schreker and Kodaly, but she has written two quartets with incontestable skill. The art employed is strained and arid, but one feels the presence of a sensitive personality. This young artist is also a good pianist.

HENRY PRUNIÈRES.

COMING CHORAL PRODUCTIONS

THE orchestra of the Symphony Society will assist in the annual performance of Händel's "The Messiah" at Carnegie Hall on Monday evening, Dec. 27, which will open the fifty-third season of the Oratorio Society of New York. The soloists are Della Baker, soprano; Doris Doe, contralto; Dan Beddoe, tenor, and Arthur Middleton, baritone.

Results of the Jewish Ethnological Expedition, sent in memory of Baron Horatio de Guinsbourg to collect remote examples of Jewish folklore and music, will be presented in Carnegie Hall on Dec. 26 in a program devoted to Hebrew music. Lazare Saminsky, musical director of Temple Emanu-El and one of the leaders of the expedition, has arranged the program, which will include folk music of the Dagestan, Persian, Georgian, Polish, Jemmenite, South Russian, Spanish, Lithuanian and Galilean Jews.

The English Singers will give a special holiday program at their next appearance, Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 28, in the Town Hall.

The Schola Cantorum gives its Christmas concert of classical choral works on Wednesday evening, Dec. 29, at Carnegie Hall.

A performance of "Aida" at the Metropolitan matinee on Dec. 30 is arranged for the endowment fund of Juniper Lodge, a Summer home for members of the Faculty of Smith College.

MAJORS AND MINORS.

Radio artists of the "Moment Musicale" group of Station WMCA are to appear "in person" tomorrow evening at the McAlpin. They are Roland Meyer, violin; Minnie Weil, piano; Mildred Windell, soprano, and Snedden Weir, baritone.

An hour of music at the International Club, 2 West Sixty-fourth Street, this afternoon engages Carolyn LeGalyon, pianist, and a string quartet comprising Messrs. Weissman, Biederman, Galati and Viborg.

The regular monthly concert by students of the Neighborhood Music School, 238 East 105th Street, will be held in the auditorium there on Tuesday evening.

Nina Tarasova, singer of Russian folksongs, has planned a new type of recital at the Times Square Theatre on Jan. 9, presenting songs from the times of Vladimir the Great and the Boyars to the modern days of the Bolshevists.

EXHIBITIONS IN NEW YORK GALLERIES

Ingres's Greek and Roman Transcriptions—Eighteenth Century Color Prints and Work of Various Moderns Discussed

GEORGE MOORE has quoted Degas as excitedly exclaiming before a drawing of a female hand by Ingres: "Look at those fingernails! See how they are indicated!" One could only echo this excited finger pointing in contemplating the sixty drawings by Ingres with which the new De Hauke Galleries made its début.

These Ingres drawings, the fruit of a four-year (1820 to 1824) sojourn of sulking in Florence, are for the most part miraculous transcriptions of Greek and Roman friezes and sculptural pieces in the Uffizi. It is not news that, next to his beloved god Raphael, Ingres was, as we say, crazy about the antique classical fathers unearthed by Winckelman and almost destroyed by the literal art of David, the big N. A. and esthetic boss of circa 1820. (Ingres, you remember, was David's prize pupil.) But these drawings do help one to understand why his critical contemporaries contemptuously dismissed Ingres as an archaeologist.

For, to an up-to-the-minute art critic of 1825, these transcriptions were unprogressive ancester worship and, at best, linear photographs of the esthetic stones of dead ones. But we can see how much life and movement is packed into the finest pencil line. So fine are some of these lines that they seem almost imaginary. Detail could not be more inevitable or final; that is why it is a little difficult at first not to believe that the critics were joking when they said that Ingres could not draw. And, then, one remembers that this accusation always has been hurled by the critics at the artists who are one step ahead of their fellows.

NOTHING shown during the past week was quite so delightful as the fine collection of eighteenth-century French and English color prints, now on view at the Knoedler Galleries. No one ever would suspect the ladies whose charms are admiringly and rather openly celebrated in the French prints (the English, as usual, are more reserved and noisy) of being boys.

When you examine the curves and the various toilettes of the many opulent Venuses your only conclusion must be that the feminine half of the world has been on a starvation diet these past two centuries. For the ladies, say of "La Comparaison," after Lavreience by François Jaminet, never were made for our boyish-form age.—Until Jan. 8.

THE paintings of Gerald Leake at the Ferargil Galleries should please the audience that admires Arthur B. Davies. Mr. Leake is of the Guida-Michael Arlen school of romantic poetics. His world is twilight gray and pregnant with melodramatic romance. In his canvases—titled, appropriately enough, "Summer Gray" and "Spring Song" and "The Chalice"—dreamy nude and draped ladies pose in the official exalted attitudes, as symbols of Mr. Leake's pretty day dreams. The connection of this form of poetry with painting as an art is rather involved, however, and only a Houdini could disentangle the two, for even in the illustration of a mood a certain definative strength is helpful; but even Mr. Leake's textural backgrounds are diffuse and obscure.

There is nothing obscure about the work of Taber Sears, also at these galleries. His water colors are straightforward and colorful accounts of Egypt's natives and caravans, with some especially handsome views of Nile boats. Also on view at these galleries are an amusing group of "Fantasies" (paintings in silk and embroideries) by Florence W. Gottheld and a group of decorative flower and ship screens by Elizabeth Price—Until Dec. 24.

MARION MONKS CHASE in her water colors of Majorca at the Montross Galleries exposes the side of that charming Balearic isle which Sargent, who saw only what the semi-tropical sun painted, missed. For, though it lies between Spain and Africa and is a nugget of gold sparkling in the green Mediterranean, Majorca is not a bright country. It is a sad land save to romantic visitors.

Sargent painted this world as if it were a bright, cheery Tyrol. He did not see the dramatic purples and reds and livid grays that streak the Majorcan horizon at sunrise or the deserted silences of its sinister coves. Miss Chase does, and so something of the theatrical aspect of this world is communicated. Her other water colors are of Boston and Massachusetts, and they, too, possess a certain distinctive merit, now and then too reminiscent of the Japanese masters.—Until Dec. 30.

VIVIAN GUY, the English painter, is showing some pleasant water colors—at the White-Allom Galleries—of Benares and of a number of scenes at the Durbar, held in India several years ago in honor of the Prince of Wales.

MISS CHASE is also a member of the group of five water colorists whose recent work is being exhibited at the Rehn Galleries. To this gathering she contributes several still lifes that celebrate the orange and yellow of the citrus family quite seductively. The most interesting member of this group, however, is Harley Perkins, who is represented by some energetic landscapes of Canadian farms and hidden quarries. Mr. Perkins's color is somewhat gray, but the vibrant movement of his "Long Road" more than makes up for this. Charles Hopkinson exposes several agreeable studies of the sights he glimpsed through windows in Venice and Florence and a purple Cornwall harbor. A distinctive sense of design is manifested by Charles Hovey Pepper in "A Mountain Lake," and Carl G. Cutler contributes several landscapes.—Until Dec. 31.

ROBERT W. CHANLER is easily the most arresting member of the group of three artists whose work is now being exhibited at the Grand Central Art Galleries. What with some sixty of his tremendous screens and panels and a collection of portraits, Mr. Chanler is quite evidently a Gargantuan worker. Virtually all of these screens and panels have been loaned, and it is enough to say of them that they are the most decorative affairs of their kind that this chronicler has seen in a long time. Their symbolism is not in the way. Whether Mr. Chanler's symbolism be considered obscure or obvious, the workmanship of his screens is first-rate, the novelty of his designs is inimitable. Most of the portraits were noticed in these columns several weeks ago.

The recent paintings of Roy Brown, N. A., also at the Grand Central Galleries, are mostly concerned with the landscapes of Maine, Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Of Mr. Brown's painting it is not necessary to say more, at the present time, than that it is competent and honest; that it is animated by a talented, if slightly idealized, perception of the limned aspects of domes and skyscrapers. Mr. Brown is an American painter of the school whose prize pupil was the late Willard L. Metcalf, save that he is more sober.

At these same galleries Dean Cornwell is exhibiting decorative paintings of the "City of the Great King"—in other words, Jerusalem.—Until Dec. 24.

HERMAN TRUNK, Henry Winslow and John Kellogg Woodruff—constituting another group of water colorists—are being exhibited at the Richard Dudensing Galleries. Mr. Trunk's water colors are pleasant—arrangements of landscapes, fabrics and liquor bottles—with a slight obeisance to cubist theology. His design is more precise than alive, but it is distinctive and has lots of formalized style. He should, as the the dramatic critics say, go far.

Henry Winslow's water colors are preoccupied with various aspects of sea and harbor life: the movement of tramp steamers, the gossip of seamen—probably about their hauling catch—and girls washing clothes. Mr. Winslow paints all these in a rather subdued and even diffuse water color, but well within the limits of a light design.

As the catalogue remarks, "John Kellogg Woodruff needs no introduction to the art world."—Until Jan. 1.

BRIEFER MENTION

A PRIVATE collection of fine prints is on view at the Harlow Galleries until Dec. 24. It includes forty-seven plates by LeRay and twenty-seven by Frank W. Benson, all fine impressions; an especially brilliant impression of Muirhead Bone's "Rainy Night in Rome," a number of vigorous sea subjects by Arthur Briscoe, and plates by Bellenroche, Beurdeley, Bicknell, Brangwyn, Benington Eubot, Cameron, Cesare, Cole, Corot, De Milhau, Eby, Fantin-Latour, Forain, Haden, Hornby, Legros, Lepere, Levy, MacLaughlan, Pennell, Roth and Whistler, with a few lithographs and Rhotints. In spite of its variety the collection has a decided coherence, due to the pronounced taste of the collector responsible for assembling it.

Pop Hart's lithograph "Springtime: New Orleans" won a bronze medal at the Sesquicentennial Exposition. The subject is a bare-footed man shaving, with appropriate grimaces, before a small mirror in a shabby and disorderly attic room, through the window of which are seen the roofs and steeples of the town. The free, authoritative execution, the brilliant contrasts of light and dark and the unhackneyed point of view are characteristic of the artist's work in this medium.

An exhibition of paintings by Professor Theodore Wedepohl of Berlin will be open through December at the Gainsborough Galleries. Professor Wedepohl has exhibited in various European capitals and is also a well-known writer on art. He has published a volume on perspective that is said to be the most authoritative work extant on the subject of perspective as applied to painting, and is now being translated into English for publication in this country. Among the portraits in the exhibition are those of Mr. Coffin, American Consul General in Berlin; Mr. Schnetzendorff of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Mrs. Artur Bodansky. Among the landscapes are a number of Iceland, which will be unfamiliar to the American public. In 1928 this artist will accompany Dr. Eckner to the North Pole.

The American Institute of Graphic Arts has added a traveling exhibition of illustrated books to three exhibitions of books and prints. The most significant and interesting thing about this exhibition is that it is a collection of ordinary books, made extraordinary by illustration, which could not have been gathered fifteen years ago.

Under the sponsorship of a committee of distinguished leaders in art and industry, an exhibition will be held at the Anderson Galleries to illustrate the close relationship between the contemporary fine arts and industrial art. The exhibition will consist of paintings of Kees Van Dongen, a contemporary painter, together with a series of new silks made by Cheney Brothers and inspired by the work of the French artist.

Haywoth Campbell is Chairman of the committee under whose auspices the exhibition will be held. Other members of this committee include: Frank Alvah Parsons, Dr. John H. Finley, Richardson Wright, Mrs. Fairfield Osborn, Stewart Culin, Dana Cornwell, J. Monroe Hewlett and Dr. Christian Brinton.

The exhibition will be formally opened on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 1, and will continue from Jan. 3 to 8.

The Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts announces its one hundred and twenty-second annual exhibition, which will open to the public on Sunday, Jan. 30, 1927, and close on Sunday, March 20, 1927. The press view and vernissage day will be Saturday, Jan. 29, from 10 A. M. until 4 P. M. The reception and private view will be given on the same evening. The exhibition will consist of original works by living American artists in oil paintings and sculpture, which have not before been publicly shown in Philadelphia. All works intended for exhibition must be sent to the Academy by Saturday, Jan. 1.

The juries of selection are: For painting, Philip L. Hale, R. Sloan Brooke, John F. Carlson, Truman F. Fassett, Charles Hopkinson, Eric Hudson, Jonas Lie, Leopold Seyffert, Leslie P. Thompson, Carroll S. Tyson Jr., Robert Vonnoh; for sculpture, Charles Grafly, Albert Laessle and Adolph A. Weinman. The Hanging Committee will be Philip L. Hale, R. Sloan Brooke and Charles Grafly.

A memorial exhibition of prints by Mary Cassatt, including dry-point color prints and her one attempt at lithography, has been arranged in the Print Gallery of the New York Public Library, Room 321. The prints are taken from the remarkable collection of nineteenth century work formed by the late S. P. Avery and given by him to the library in 1900.

MANY ART THEFTS REPORTED IN PARIS

FRANCE has witnessed in the last year not precisely an epidemic but a notable series of burglaries of historic buildings, some of which contain treasures of great value. A few days after thieves had scaled the tower of the Château de Chantilly and made off with the famous Condé Diamond, the basilica of Notre-Dame de Bonne Garde at Longpont was robbed. The manner of the theft was similar to that of the treasure of Notre-Dame de Cléry.

Having tried unsuccessfully to break in by the main door, the robbers removed an iron bar and entered by the window of the sacristy. They took many silver vessels, but failed to force a strong box containing crosses, chalices and other articles ornamented with diamonds and emeralds and valued at millions of francs. Two previous attempts had been made to pillage this box.

The Longpont church, visited by thousands of pilgrims every year, dates from the tenth century. It is regarded as ranking second among the churches of France in the possession of treasure and relics, St. Cecile of Toulouse being first. In the Middle Ages, monks were often forced to flee from their retreats, taking their treasures into hiding, to escape pillage by the armies of kings, princes and nobles.

America's Most Densely Populated Market

New York City and the 100 towns within a radius of 50 miles which have a population exceeding 1,000 form the basis of a most interesting and valuable study included in "A Study of 31 Principal American Markets," recently issued by The 100,000 Group of American Cities.

The New York Times has published a 16-page pamphlet embracing the New York market, giving ten tabular statistical pages of information, including population, number of families, dwellings, male and female buyers, number of automobiles, retail outlets and wholesale firms.

FIFTY YEARS OF FRENCH IMPRESSIONISM

PAINTERS OF '76

Group Then Exhibiting Again Seen at Same Galleries

By ELISABETH L. CARY.

THE old and rather foolish phrase, "fifty years young," nowhere applies more credibly than to the French impressionists whose first appearance as a coherent group dates back just half a century to an exhibition held at the Durand-Ruel Gallery in the rue le Peletier. Today the work of this group, with a few sufficiently pertinent additions, may be seen in a commemorative exhibition at the Durand-Ruel Galleries in this city. The firm has given the space and Mr. Chester Dale has given the catalogue, with its excellent preface by Maud Dale, which will be sold for the benefit of the French Hospital of New York.

The conjunction of a gift to charity with this memorial exhibition has a certain fitness. It is most improbable that this long-established firm of art dealers ever has regretted taking into its rooms the little group of Intransigeants, Independents, Impressionists—any title that could be twisted to the purposes of ridicule. It is quite beyond doubt that the firm has been the gainer by its wise hospitality. But it was not so clear in 1876, when critics sneered and the public jeered, and, worst of all, the buyers would not buy nor the salons accept the pictures of these daring young painters who insisted upon throwing open French windows and stepping into the outside air. Even Manet, to whom favorable attention at last had been attracted by his contributions to former salons, held back from joining his friends in their private exhibitions. The path to their final brilliant victory over popular and special prejudice was a hard road to travel, and more than one of the group knew actual want during the journey. All the more praise to the few who supported them, to the firm which offered them space and bought their apparently unsalable works; to Caillebotte, a fellow-painter, who most fortunately also was a banker and invested in these doubtful securities; to Choquet, who bought pictures when he needed an overcoat and went without the coat to do so.

Some Critics Appreciative.

The critics of the press, as well, though liberally quoted in their ignorance and ill-temper, included quite a number who recognized the special quality of the Impressionists and whose quietly reasoned opinions have found a place in the history of the movement. Castagnary, writing of the exhibition of 1876, found the landscapes by Monet, Pissarro and Sisley "true" and "vibrant," the portraits by Renoir and Berthe Morisot "fine" and "living," the studies of dancers by Degas "superb." Alexandre Pothey wrote that Monet's landscapes were invariably distinguished by frankness of handling, genuine sentiment and beautiful light. Emile Blément offered a clear and just definition of the theory of the Impressionists and said of them as a group: "They are synthesists, not analysts, and let us admit that in this they are right, since analysis is the scientific method, par excellence, and synthesis the chosen process of art. They have no laws other than the necessary relations of things. The think with Diderot, that the idea of the beautiful is the perception of these relations." There are others who in greater or less degree appreciated the intelligence and sincerity of the exhibitors and we cannot ignore their influence.

Nevertheless the general attitude was cruelly inimical, and to look at these quiet, robust, thoughtful achievements in the light of later experience, and what we must hope is increased knowledge, is to marvel at a state of mind that could find them either ridiculous or contemptible. The artists must themselves have marveled, but they went on with their work, intellectually and morally strong and completely convinced.

Among the paintings now on view at the Durand-Ruel Galleries is "La Seine à Argenteuil," by Monet, dated 1875, and probably one of the canvasses exhibited in 1876. It shows in any case the station at which the painter, then 35 years old, had arrived in the development of his open air painting. Compare it, sound and rich, but with darkness in its unbrageous depths, with the blond charm of the "Antibes" of 1888 or the quivering pallor of the Rouen Cathedral of 1894, and it will be seen that a long life was needed to push to its extreme fulfillment the Impressionist conception of light and atmosphere.

Renoir and Degas.

Renoir is supremely represented by his "Baigneuse" of 1885, majestic in its amplitude of cool firm flesh, thrilling with vitality and clothing a youthful vigorous frame. Seated on a beach, the white figure is thrown into salient relief by clumps of pyrotechnic color in the background. Another nude, "Femme couchée," eighteen years later in date, beautiful in modeling and pallid in flesh, a refined and softened edition of Courbet, might suggest a period earlier instead of later than the "Baigneuse." Renoir's assertive strawberry red appears in a sensitive and reserved modification in the covering of the sofa.

Degas also is shown in particular magnificence by a pastel of 1882, ballet girls behind the scenes and on the stage, gay in color as a Flemish garden, and by a magisterial version of his many times repeated "Sortie du Bain." In these two examples this great master of the nineteenth century is seen in full command not only of line but of color. His command of line was early discovered and apparently has filled the mind and heart of every commentator. His command of color often has been denied. It is unnecessary verbally to affirm it in the presence of these triumphant affirmations.

Mary Cassatt is represented by a "Mère, bébé et petite fille" from Mrs. Havemeyer's authoritative collection, Cézanne by a still life of first importance and a landscape, Manet by the boy blowing soap bubbles from Mr. Lewisohn's collection, a pastel head of a child lent by Mr. Dale, and one of the bull fights in which Goya could have seen his reflection. "Le lever" by Berthe Morisot is another instance of the Impressionists' habit of repeating a favorite theme, in this case an especially light, gracious version, the little girl in her chemise poised on the edge of her bed eloquent in every line of the aristocratic sentiment and feminine charm of Berthe Morisot's work throughout her distinguished career. Camille Pissarro with a landscape of 1871 and another of 1900 shows less change than any of his companions in his manner of translating his serene observations upon nature. Of the two "La grande route" of 1871 seems to show most of maturity and breadth of vision.

Finally Sisley, gentle, gay and sympathetic, whose delicately original work had in it nothing of revolt or disturbing passion, and whose fate at the hands of conservative critics was more severe than that of any of his companions. He sold his best pictures for barely a hundred francs apiece, according to Duret, and was glad to take dinners and lunches from an art-loving restaurateur in payment for others. He is here with two lovely and expensive landscapes.

ART WINS NEW SUCCESS IN CONCRETE AND LINOLEUM

Sarrebezolles' "Immortal" Tower—Kassler's Block Prints—Shows in Paris Galleries

By RUTH GREEN HARRIS.

PARIS.

IT is always a privilege to be allowed to study a work as it proceeds; but he who has had the opportunity of climbing, by way of its scaffolding, the concrete tower of the Church of St. Louis at Villemombre, near Paris, has been peculiarly fortunate. The sculptor, M. Sarrebezolles, says he is the first to cut architectural decorations out of ferro concrete. Ferro concrete is spoken of as a substance sufficiently unwise or clever to have found the secret of immortality. Though this substance has not had time to be put to the test, the assumption is that there will never be another scaffolding on the building; that the non-corroding stuff will never be in need of restoration or repair.

Only an artist of special ability can cope with the material. He must be sure and quick; must be keenly alive not only to the nature of the material but also to the fundamental architectural form. He must never betray the form. Concrete admits of no change of mind. Even fresco painting presents fewer difficulties. A false piece can be put out and the artists may start again. Here, however, there is no such opportunity. Concrete hardens beyond the possibility of alteration.

The sculptor is aided a little in his problems by the fact that the essential form leads the way. A sensitive tool, bold because it is sensitive, involuntarily follows, cutting the surface in large firm strokes. A portion of concrete is set in a square-cornered wooden box the night before. The next day it is sufficiently formed to allow the stays to be removed. Then M. Sarrebezolles starts work.

His great undertaking has been finished in three months. Twenty figures in all have been arranged in two tiers, each more than twenty-one feet high. There are eight smaller figures and a number of smaller heads to brighten the surface, as it were, with a slightly finer carving. The whole stands as a symbol of the Church, with the great Pope Gregory as a leading figure. That M. Sarrebezolles must do as many as four heads in three hours gives an idea of the necessary speed of the work.

IT is a long road from concrete to linoleum, but a road worth taking, if at the end one is promised block prints by Charles Moffat Kassler. The American artist and the French sculptor start at the same point. Both make themselves subservient to the medium they are using; both allow it, as dictator, to direct them.

Mr. Kassler is a painter as well as a graver and would be the first to admit that block printing is a minor art. It has its personal virtue, however, and little conscious charms shared with no other artistic form. His are not prints from wood but from a softer material that lends itself more graciously to the gouge. It gives the prints the aspect of a freer and more direct design—as if the craftsman drew with the sharp tools themselves, instead of following the pencil drawing that the wood engraver generally uses. The prints have a different color and texture. They are not as sparkling as wood engravings but more shining, if that be an understandable distinction. They have not the quality of a cut jewel but rather of a freshly washed surface.

Mr. Kassler has done a series of animals of his imagination. Now he becomes master—master designer. He has trained these queer beasts never to take a false step, never to stray without reason, never to lose the pattern of their existence. They are put into a quite arbitrary world made of small forms full of variation and caprice. A noteworthy quality of the artist's design is that a large gesture is always stopped before it becomes tiresome. This gives a play of straight and curve that seems to take the spectator a little beyond the two-dimensional black and white.

JEAN CROTTI, at the Barbazanges Galleries, is showing fifty-five pictures without titles. To say that M. Crotti draws with a line similar to that of Brancusi and paints with color that seems to have drawn its strength from fertile earth may give some idea of the physical nature of his work. Beyond that it is baffling.

At the Bing Gallery, Helmut Kolle von Huegel makes double-jointed compositions, as awkward and as agile in their movement as the antics of a clown. He paints on huge canvases loaded with paint that looks as if it had been carved with a gouge after it was dry. A jockey stands on his characteristically malformed legs reading the Paris Sports. He holds the paper in outstretched hands as daintily as if it were a piece of chiffon. A jockey gives the artist a more obvious opportunity for the light and heavy nature of his form. It is equally conspicuous in all his painting.

Paintings by such men as André Lhote, W. Gimi and Roger Bissière and Utrillo take one to the Galerie E. Druet. Bissière is like Fragonard—with a difference. The difference lies in the period in which they painted rather than in the nature of the men. Both are decorators; both have perhaps a little too much sympathy with the subject of their choice; both as is proved by the decorative strength of their work, have the ability to detach themselves from it. Both seem to be hampered by the age in which they work: the earlier artificial and the present scoffing. Gimmi's "Flowers" push their open mouths toward the spectator, holding the passer-by with the eagerness of their call.

Robert Lotiron's carefully lighted landscapes and Rousseau-like trees settle into a composition that leaves no doubt as to the roundness of the world. Simon-Levy's landscapes are moist in color, with a gentle, even breathing to the composition. One often sees, especially in a child, a pair of blue eyes so wide and so blue that one feels their very blueness must color what they see. With such a bright blue innocence Valdo Barbey paints "Paysage Provençal" and "Village Marin."

"Lilies," by Anne Goldthwaite.

ARTS APPLIED

Alcoves in Metropolitan Museum Show Ideals Of the Past

IN order to judge the future of the arts, said the Comte de Laborde, just place yourself upon the very summit of their past; here you will find an infallible observatory, since that which has been shall be, that which has been chased away by fashion, fantasy, caprice, shall return home by the path already traversed. You need only wait.

Passing from the extensive exhibition of modern industrial design at the Metropolitan Museum into the little cubicles intensively arranged by Joseph Breck to represent "the varying fortunes of the applied arts in the nineteenth century," it is difficult to share the optimism of the Comte de Laborde, difficult to think that the home life of which the home arts are an expression will again expand into a richly nourishing atmosphere for strong personalities; an atmosphere that cannot, by the way, be exhibited by samples.

The exhibition as a whole, Mr. Breck says in The Bulletin, has presented many thorny problems both in selection and arrangement, and it is apparent that this has been the case. It is surprising that so reasonable a result has been achieved. The cubicles or alcoves are small, and the more ambitious among the dwellings of the nineteenth century—the only ones to appeal to an American museum—were high-ceiled and offered long stretches of wall against which to place furniture and decorations. The characteristic hospitality to many things of many kinds did not, therefore, include among the sins for which it was responsible an aspect of overcrowding. Where from one point of view these dwellings were shapeless and overloaded, from another they had color and volume and the queer dignity of a taste that was not self-conscious, however bad.

The Things He Liked.

If the alcoves leave us ignorant of this quality they nevertheless touch the past at sufficiently significant points. They remind us of the spacious rooms, some of which even now survive with their overstuffed and satin-covered furniture, their cheval glasses, their Parisian vases, their crimson damask curtains, their niche for the excellent genre sculpture of John Rogers. Standing on the summit of past art, one could regard cheerfully enough the return of a style that was interwoven with the very fabric of a society, and managed, for all its dire offense, to embody the sense of deeply rooted human interests. One could almost wish to live to see it return by the path along which it fled from the attack of fashion, fantasy and caprice.

Forging through the cubicles to the point where the nineteenth century makes a somewhat ragged break with the eighteenth, a systematic visitor will begin with Alcove 1, in which neo-classicism and the Empire style dodge the structural simplicity by using a profusion of metal ornament. Simple lines, however, symmetrical arrangement, neat and restful balance.

Alcove 2 shows modifications of the Empire style, leaning toward a more delicate severity and enlivened by an Aubusson carpet of unusual charm. At this point the descriptive label presses into its little space the whole history of a reversal of taste in a changing world.

Then came Victoria and the deluge. Alcove 3: "Romanticism," wins that title by the tendency of the period to emphasize the interest of things remote in time or place. That the things upon which its interest was focused were, according to the testimony of the alcove, esthetically the most appalling of any time or any place, is perhaps beside the mark. The point is that the individual householder was in power, that all the things he liked went into his house. And that he greatly liked his house is another point, the one saving grace in the orgy of individualism. Alcove Three, in the face of the rococo piano and the set of scroll-saw shelves, a "what-not" indeed, gives us something of what the actual room of this early Victorian period gave—a lovely sense of excess. The rooms of today have reduced to the point of injuring the heart. One may die of other maladies than fatty degeneration.

Bulging With Atrocities.

In Alcove 4, degeneration is far advanced. The comforting beauty of excess ceases to be visible. A terrible room bulging with atrocities, yet containing a charming painting by Alfred Stevens extinguished by a background of flock paper in cherry red. This alcove is the only one of the series which says noisily: "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here." This alcove is the only one in which it is impossible to recognize with the slightest pride the mark of one's ancestors. And what period does it represent in the eyes of the astute assembler? The period of antiquarianism, that in which "individuals rivalled museums in collecting 'antiques'; and for those who could not afford the genuine, obliging manufacturers offered reproductions and imitations of varying merit." Can it be that this period, alone of those represented, has turned in its flight and already is speeding back to us?

The two remaining alcoves are given to the revival of craftsmanship in England under William Morris and the style known as "L'Art Nouveau" in France.

If there is one truth driven home more forcibly than any other by this fragmentary but very interesting exhibition, it is that in the arts of the house what we need most is the coming of a modern Euripides to unite the abstract ideal with the homely commonplace of life. E. L. C.

SPORTS STYLES LEAD IN RESORT FASHIONS

The Influence of a More Feminine Type of Millinery Is Shown in a Late Paris Model of Black Velvet.

WOOLEN FABRICS ARE IN VOGUE

American Influence Seen Even in the Styles From Paris

THERE is a considerable gap between the scene of Winter sports and the lands of warm, golden midwinter sunshine. While the makers of fine clothes are still busy with the sturdy styles that women of fashion who are athletic in their activities are wearing at St. Moritz, Quebec, Lake Placid and the other Winter resorts, they are revolving in their thought designs for costumes of an entirely different type. Ideas range from the mannish sports togs to the most feminine attire, from the most severe requirements of the North to the most softly subtle things that will meet happily the requirements of the South and the seashore. There is little variation in the style designs for this particular season of outing and luxury on both sides of the water, and the endeavors of up-to-date French and American dressmakers are wholly en rapport.

The distance and difference between American leaders of fashion and the ultra-fashionables of the European Winter resorts have been spanned, and representative couturiers at Paris are sending their very best designs to this country, matching the last word in style as it is seen at the high spots along the Riviera, the Lido and other European resorts. There is always a touch of exaggeration in the attire seen at the foreign watering places, more conspicuous than formerly, now that travel tends to establish more uniform modes and conventions. Paris still proposes, and illustrates in a Continental setting the style conceptions, and a fashionable public on this side is seen to be not far behind the pace. The modes to be seen at Palm Beach and all the other Southern resorts are now as distinguished as those anywhere abroad.

THIS season promises to be what merchants would call a banner year, beginning early with a long and full social program, for which elaborate equipment is in preparation. Advance models from the French designers offer suggestions that are wholly different from the styles of former years. They tell an interesting story to the observant of the change in type that has come into dress for Winter resorts in the South. Parisian couturiers are making for the women of their fashionable resorts costumes that reflect an unmistakable American influence, as definitely expressed as the ideas that find such response among American women. There is less of the elaborated sort of thing in general—far more of the simple, of the tailleur in one variant or another; and if any one type might be singled out, it must certainly be sports dress as it is understood over here. To this the Parisienne, and with her the chic woman of all Europe, is absolutely converted, and what was once regarded as a departure from the feminine is now the accepted style that finds expression in dress for any and every occasion.

PERHAPS the wave of common sense which brought woolen hosiery into vogue has also made fashionable wool clothing for women, so that the lesson of wool fabrics for an atmosphere of sea spray and mist, of early dew and late damp, has inspired manufacturers to design fabrics that are both beautiful and practical. They are woolens and worsted of gossamer weight, fine texture and artistic patterns that are being made into frocks and wraps for the sea and mountains; the kind of things that offer most compensating results in skillful handling; that are comfortable, becoming, and that retain their shape—all very important considerations for an outing wardrobe. Wool, woven as fine as silk, sometimes with silk as either surface or foundation, is of a quality and appearance to inspire most unusual designs in suits, frocks, coats and ensembles. In the most finished weaves a costume of wool is the answer to the season's first call.

A Costume Suitable for Many Occasions at a Southern Watering Place Is Designed by an American Artist and Done in Madonna Blue Crepe With Embroidery in Several Colors.

PASTEL SHADES ARE IN FAVOR

APART from the white woolen costumes for the season's beginning are many colors in delightful tones and shades. One, poetically named the Lorelei, is a reversible coating having a modernistic pattern in colored silk on a white wool ground. A most alluring example of this is gray silk on which a wave length design is accomplished in a white woolly nap. Parquette is a block pattern in metal colored silk on a white wool corded base. Pastel shades in downy wool stripes alternate with narrow lines of white silk. Along with these are shown a number of attractive plain weaves particularly good for coats. There is a soft suede called yalama, Manitobe, a practical coating for both town and country, and the new variants of rep, repglow, repbloom, repeau, colleen rep and repingle. These are conspicuously distinguished from the imported Scotch woolens, which are beautiful and sumptuous, but which are generally too heavy for Southern wear.

Following along the line of woolen fabrics are the lightest weaves that are made especially for dresses. In these there are the same stripes, checks, diagonals, dominos and a particularly graceful moiré wave pattern. A novelty is arrowhead, a textile marked with tiny arrowheads in self tones. Tanagar is a three-tone check skillfully woven on the diagonal; grenatone, a two-tone broken plaid; silver mist and silver haze, a whimsical treatment of soft ground tones overwoven with silvery threads. These novelties supply a part of a modish outfit in a certain type of dress in which is reflected the fashion in colors. There is a palette full of these, and few favorites. Green is distinctly fashionable in shades known as mignon, lido green, almond, sage,

NOVEL NECKLACES

FOR those who never feel that a costume is complete without a pin, necklace or boutonniere of some kind, there are really countless numbers of them to be had. Here the matter of choice is fairly easy, for the designers and importers apparently have considered all sizes and varieties of women when sending out their wares. Simple gold necklaces with bracelets to match come in filigree motifs strung together. Others made entirely of links show colors that will blend in well with the coming Spring fabrics. Colored crystal and wide use of imitation onyx form the basis of an interesting collection of jewelry for Palm Beach wear.

VELVET MODISH IN GIRLS' WRAPS

Variety of Colors Worn And Fur Is Used for Trimming

VELVET is much liked for coats for girls, large and small, and some beautiful models are shown in color for evening. Those for a girl who will go to the junior parties are rather elaborate, in velvet and metal brocade and trimmed with fur. Lamé is used for some of the more ornate. One attractive wrap for a subdeb is of Italian turquoise, one of the newest dyes in satin and silver brocade, lined with plain turquoise velvet, with a wide collar of pale gray fox. A wrap of silver lamé delicately embroidered with crystal is lined with cameo pink velvet, trimmed with white fox, and is designed as part of an ensemble, the frock being a white net sprinkled with crystal beads, with a girdle of silver lam and a spray of pink roses.

Many girls and young women are now wearing a flower, a boutonnière or a chic bow on one shoulder of an evening dress. This little model, which is not original but is varied to meet the mode of the day, is done in white with silver or gilt stitching and in all of the delicate evening shades. Taffeta frocks are shown with needlework embroidered motifs and flounces and bands of metal lace. Velvet is very fashionable for children, a black velvet dress being found serviceable and becoming for both daytime and evening and equally suitable for girls of almost any age.

An amusing novelty in shoes is one in light reptile skin or suede trimmed with bands and bits of calf skin in the hair. To correspond with these are hat ornaments

WHITE SPORTS COATS APPROVED

Lightweight Fabrics in Varied Designs Are Shown For the Winter Resorts Season

COATS are of especial interest because there is in these an insistent demand for white. The odd coat for driving or sports, the polo coat or a ragian for any rough and ready occasion has long been a necessary item in the wardrobe of a woman who had any social activities or who traveled. For the Southern traveler this was almost invariably of white or light goods, but otherwise nondescript. The white coat of this season is made of newly designed stuff and, in being selected to match the gown, completes the ensemble.

The art of the representative designers has put together with success plain and figured materials, wool lined with silk and the reverse order. Patterns are altogether new and of great variety. There are mosaic blocks, diagonals, mixtures, broken checks and stripes. In some of these rayon is interlaced with wool thread marking the design in high lustre, of which a number are shown in ensemble models. There are many of feather weight, supple, lending gracefully to clever handling in the new models. Among these are designs of the latest type, more subtle, more intricate than anything that has appeared in late years. The materials made especially for coats are reversible, in modernistic patterns, firm and lustrous or soft napped, of all wool or with a silk base on which the nap defines the pattern.

ALONG with the newest versions of wool materials are the wool crêpes and kashas, which we have had before and which have proved to be so satisfactory. Flannel is now, as always, the seashore fabric, very popular this season for sports and morning dress in tailored and semi-tailored models known as the soft sports dress.

Fur trimming is interesting, for it is shown on most of the coats and ensembles, though usually for the collar only. White fox, white hare, baby fox with a faint gray edge, gray and orange fox, fawn, antelope, undyed kolinsky, Summer ermine and Chinese hare are some of the furs that are shown on both French and American wraps and ensembles for the South.

Felt, such as makes up the smart little toques, turbans and sports hats, has been adapted for hand bags of voluminous proportions. Usually they are mounted on bright, shiny frames and have strap handles of the felt. Inside may be found all the necessary fittings, with extra-large side pockets. These bags are smart looking and come in all the staple colors, as well as in light green, bright red, orange, beige, gray and white.

One of the Season's Favored Wool Fabrics, in Gold and White, Is Presented in This Swagger Short Coat With Kilt Skirt of Plain White in a Suit Designed for Palm Beach.

HOLIDAY HINTS TO AID SHOPPER

Last Minute Suggestions Of Christmas Gifts for The Puzzled

WITH little time left to do last-minute shopping, everybody is rushing to and fro trying to accomplish all that can be done with as little confusion as possible. Needless to say such a task is bewildering, not for want of ideas or suggestions but because of the wide differences in tastes of people who must be remembered. The only way to finish the job is the one finally adopted, to make a decision and stand by it. When the gift is selected cross it off and let it go at that. Everywhere are to be seen Christmas lists with varied suggestions; in fact, some of the magazines and papers have gone so far as to catalogue articles that would be suitable for members of the family, friends, casual acquaintances and so forth. With the time now so limited, it would not be unwise to take one of these and start forth. Especially would it prove of inestimable value to those who have not yet begun their shopping.

More or less free from the danger of too personal gifts are the collections of small note books, with fancy covers of hand-tooled leather. Others, plainer and not much larger than a postage stamp, with a place left for appointments and memorandums, come in colors that are both gay and practical, suitable for either men or women. Golf scores in pad form are equipped with detachable covers in Florentine leather. A slim pencil is attached. Telephone pads, opening either like a book or a tablet, favor the light colors and are shown in a number of styles, with props to stand them up or as extra covers on fancy boxes.

THERE is an ever increasing variety in the fancy boxes of brass, copper, wood and leather—so varied in shapes and sizes that they suggest a large number of uses. Other desk and table accessories, and accessories they are in every sense of the word, are ash trays. Surely there is no desk, table or stand complete without at least one that may be practical and ornamental as these. All sorts of glass, metals, china, pottery and galalith have been enrolled to make them both both useful and attractive.

From China there are little round bowls that look as if they should be holding bulbs of some kind, and some with more color that certainly were meant to hold rice. Metal ash trays copied from the rug peddlers of the East have the figure of a man standing as if before a rug spread out. The rug is so draped as to form a hollow for the ashes. Other trays in stone compositions have metal figures of animals prowling about the outer edge as if the tray were a pool and they looking for their prey. Not to be overlooked are the numerous ships, sailing vessels and the like in brass and burnished steel.

Handbags of suede, alligator, lizard, calf and fabrics of silk, taffeta or hand-woven bits of tapestry come in such lovely shapes and color combinations that it is indeed difficult to know what to select. Envelope and pouch are both seen in smart leathers and styles, and are equally good from a fashion value. Of course, the bag pouch has more of a utility purpose, while the smaller bags, and especially those with a touch of marcasite, lend a touch of the formal to any costume.

SOMETHING that should never be overlooked in the selection of a gift by a woman for a woman is stockings. With the established vogue for chiffon stockings and the constantly increasing numbers of colors in which they are now being shown, no woman can ever have too many. There are heel reinforcements of every description, from the squares of black so much in vogue when the remainder is of sheer gunmetal, the single pointed heel and the "V" line. Light grays and beige tones are the safest choice, though not to be overlooked are the gunmetals and deep brown tones.

Silk underwear in sets consisting of step-in, gown and negligee make an attractive and useful gift. Here, too, the tendency is noted for sheer stuffs such as voile, georgette and chiffon. Most of these garments are lace trimmed and made up in pastel shades of yellow, pink, rose, peach, lavender and green. Separate garments are also shown but in most cases in plainer models. Here glove silk, crepe de chine and the tub silks are given wider rein, and little trimming is used, cut and finish taking its place.

Kimonos are fanciful and if not fashioned of gay color silks are trimmed elaborately, so that no matter what happens they are in most instances a swishing mass of color. This season many of the new models are shorter than before, although the simple straight lines of the past are used again. Sleeves very often carry out the details of trimming.

FLOWERS there are in an array of colors and specimens that would startle any botanist. For wear with street clothes there are little boutonnières of leather and the lacquered fabrics. With the afternoon dress may be worn huge bunches of violets with or without foliage. Carnations of huge size in either silk or chiffon make flattering additions to any of the new frocks. Soft floppy roses of various hues with trailing stems and touches of foliage are very appropriate for evening wear.

Gloves with fancy cuffs are numerous and make a very acceptable gift. Some of the plainer ones of the slip-on type are very appropriate.

SOCIETY BEGINS HOLIDAY ACTIVITIES FOR DEBUTANTES

DEBS FACED BY CROWDED WEEK

Calendar Includes Many Dinners and Dances In Their Honor

CHRISTMAS WEEK will stand out as an important period of the débutante's first season in society, and with the return from universities and other educational institutions of girls and young women also return young men and boys, from whom there have been plenty of responses to the scores of invitations that have been sent out. Mr. and Mrs. Oswald Garrison Villard are giving tomorrow night at the Ritz-Carlton a dance to introduce their daughter, Miss Dorothea Marshall Villard, an undergraduate at Smith College. At Sherry's Mrs. John Fairfax Sheridan will introduce her daughter, Miss Marie Fairfax Sheridan. And Mr. and Mrs. Edward Blanc are giving a dinner that night at the Ritz-Carlton to introduce their daughter, Miss Elliott Blanc.

MRS. NATHANIEL BOWDITCH POTTER, who since returning from Europe has been with her father, Professor Charles S. Sargent, at Holm Lea, his country place in Brookline, Mass., will give a dinner-dance in the Italian Garden of the Ambassador on Tuesday night to introduce her daughter, Miss Natalie Potter, to New York friends. Miss Potter is the daughter of the late Dr. Nathaniel Bowditch Potter of this city and was introduced to Boston friends at the party given by her grandfather on Nov. 12 at his country place.

Mr. and Mrs. James Monroe Hewlett will introduce their twin daughters, the Misses Hope and Hester Hewlett, at a luncheon to be given at Pierre's on Tuesday, where that night Mr. and Mrs. Albert Plimpton will give a dinner and dance to introduce their niece, Miss Mary S. Sheppard, who returned recently from Europe. At their home, 980 Fifth Avenue, on that night Mr. and Mrs. Simeon Chapin will have a dance to introduce their daughter, Miss Virginia Chapin, and at the Ritz-Carlton one of the largest dances of the night will be given by Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Manning, who have been in France for the past year, to introduce their daughter, Miss Rita Manning.

WEDNESDAY will be another full day. Mrs. Gifford Cochran is giving that night at the Ritz-Carlton a dance for her daughter, Miss Jean Cochran, and in the ballroom of the Colony Club Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Wise are giving a similar entertainment to introduce their daughter, Miss Eva Douglas Wise. In the afternoon at Sherry's Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. Gleason are having a reception with dancing to introduce their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Gleason, and at night in the same place Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Heather are to give a large dance to introduce their daughter, Miss Marjorie Heather. Another afternoon reception with dancing will be held at Sherry's by Mr. and Mrs. William John Knott of Flushing, who are introducing to their friends here their daughter, Miss Margaret Knott. While not a dance particularly for débutantes, Mr. and Mrs Edgerton Parsons will give one following a dinner on Wednesday at their home, 1,155 Park Avenue, for their daughter, Miss Alice Edgerton Parsons.

MR. AND MRS. EDWARD F. HUTTON will give a ball for their daughter, Miss Adelaide Brevoort Hutton, at the Ritz-Carlton on Thursday night, which will be one of the important dances of the week. Miss Hutton was formally introduced to society at an afternoon reception held at 2 East Ninety-second Street last month when her engagement to Thomas Wells Durant was announced. Mr. and Mrs. J. Denison Sawyer and Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Bull are combining their lists for a dinner dance to be given on Thursday night at the Park Lane for Miss Lily Cushing and for Miss Phyllis Baker. Miss Cushing is the daughter of Mrs. Sawyer and the late Howard G. Cushing, a distinguished portrait painter of his day. Miss Baker is a niece of Mrs. Bull and with her sister, Miss Kathleen Baker, has been with Mr. and Mrs. Bull for two Winters.

At Sherry's Mr. and Mrs. Paul Fuller will give a supper dance to introduce their daughter Miss Cecilia Fuller, while at Pierre's Mr. and Mrs. G. Clinton Miller are giving a dinner for their daughter, Miss Camilla Miller, and many of her young friends. At the same place that night Miss Hope Yandell, a débutante of last Winter, will give a dinner for her cousin, Miss Elsie Barber.

New York Times Studios.

Miss Katherine Ogden, Who Will Be Introduced by Her Aunt, Mrs. Laurence La Tourette Driggs, Christmas Eve.

LEAGUE BALL REHEARSED

Preparations Are Made for Organization's Entertainment to Be Given Jan. 14

MEMBERS of the Junior League who will have rôles in the Ali Baba ball in aid of the organization's philanthropies, to be held in the grand ballroom suite of the Hotel Astor on Jan. 14, are hard at work under the direction of Miss Lila Stewart. Many of the features of the Arabian Nights tales are to be produced in some form, and the Forty Thieves, whose exploits have been read by millions, will appear from the jars that hide them. There will be no boiling oil, however, to prevent these girls from having a decidedly important part in the cabaret act that will be performed at the supper hour and watched by a fashionable audience seated at tables.

The invitations and handsomely illuminated circulars setting forth the importance of the ball will be sent shortly to all patrons of the league. Mrs. Edwin P. Grosvenor, the former Miss Thelma Cudlipp, has been designing the cover for the circulars. Numerous members of the league are soliciting advertisements for these circulars and are making daily visits to the great establishments of the city, whose proprietors are most generous. Mrs. Fenton Taylor is rehearsing the Junior League Glee Club, whose members are to have an important part in the forthcoming entertainment.

All money received from advertisements will be turned into the coffers of the league, whose members, naturally, work without fee for their charities. Among those undertaking this important aid to the success of the entertainment are Miss Carolyn Clark, who has recruited to her aid the Misses Rosalind Barnum, Genevieve Clendenin, Pauline Dodge, Lisa Dougherty, Marion Gray, Rachel Hammond, Florence Havemeyer, Sarah Holter, Louise Iselin, Marie Iselin, Evelyn Lanman, Ruth Pruyn, Phyllis Thompson, Gertrude Watts, Elizabeth Woodward and Grace Wrenn.

Mrs. Frank P. Shepard is Chairman of the ball, and her associates include Mrs. William Cogswell, Mrs. Stafford Hendrix, Mrs. Roadley Willis, Mrs. William M. Almy, Mrs. Reginald T. Townsend, Mrs. Roger Tuckerman, Mrs. Reginald Willis, the Misses Lydia Dadmun, Symphorosa Bristed, Claire Birge, Rachel Hammond and Marjorie Cleveland.

Tickets may be had at the Junior League, 133 East Sixty-first Street.

DEBS TO BE BUSY ON CHRISTMAS EVE

MR. and Mrs. Charles Sherman Haight are giving another of the dances of Christmas Eve at the Ambassador to introduce their daughter, Miss Harriet Haight, who was graduated from Miss Porter's School in Farmington, Conn. It will follow a large dinner in the Italian Garden of the Ambassador. The young people invited for these festivities will have a busy time of it going on from one dance to another. All the dances of the week, however, will not be for débutantes, as many juniors are to be entertained at the series known as the Holiday Dances which are to be held at the Plaza on Wednesday and Thursday. There also will be the first for this season, in the Plaza ballroom, of the Friday Junior Dances, a series for junior girls and young men organized years ago by Miss Georgiana Harriman Owen. This dance will be held on Christmas Eve. On Christmas night in town there has been announced but one large dance, and that will be given in the Italian Garden of the Ambassador by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Arthur Moore Jr., for their débutante daughter, Miss Elsie Moore.

There will be two large dances on Christmas Eve. Mr. and Mrs. Howard C. Brokaw at the Park Lane will give one of their two daughters, the Misses Julia Brokaw and Edna Loew Brokaw, who, with their parents, went to Europe for a short trip after passing the Summer at The Chimneys, the Brokaw country place in Brookville, L. I. Miss Edn Brokaw is a débutante of the season. In the main ballroom of the Ritz-Carlton Mr. and Mrs. La Tourette Driggs are giving a ball for their débutante niece, Miss Katherine Ogden, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Ogden. There will be several novel features at this dance, all in keeping with the celebration of Christmas.

Taft, Mrs. Charles J. Welch, Mrs. Henry Murphy, Miss Katherine Brady and Miss Frances Coleman.

FAMOUS TAPESTRY SHOWN

Fifteenth Century Art Work Is Exhibited On Behalf of Foundling Hospital

THERE is being exhibited in the Jacques Seligman Art Galleries, at 3 East Fifty-first Street, the world-famed fifteenth-century Quo Vadis tapestry for the benefit of the New York Foundling Hospital, which is conducted by the Sisters of Charity under the especial patronage of his Eminence Cardinal Hayes. This tapestry, brought here recently, was woven in the town of Vienne, near Lyons, about 1470 for the Abbot Antoine de Poisieu for the church in that town dedicated to St. Peter. This rare specimen of the handiwork of that century ranks with but few others of that period in this country, notably those owned by Clarence H. Mackay and Harold Irving Pratt.

The tapestry remained in the church for at least three centuries until about forty years ago, when it was removed from its original place by the French Government, as the church was made into a museum to preserve its Romanesque and Gothic features.

There will be an admission fee of $1 for the exhibition, which will end on Thursday. The proceeds will be used for the maintenance of the hospital.

Members of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Foundling Hospital are Mrs. Frederic Neilson, Mrs. Joseph Mills, Mrs. Henry Waters Taft, Miss Kathryn E. Brady, Mrs. Charles J. Welch, Mrs. William J. de Rivera, Mrs. Marshall J. McAnerney, Mrs. Stephen J. Farrelly, Miss Frances Coleman and Mrs. Henry Murphy.

WEDDINGS SET FOR HOLIDAYS

Christmas Season Chosen For Several Events By Brides-To-Be

ONE wedding of special note to society here has been arranged for the coming week, that of Miss Hope Gordon Winchester to Herbert Lee Pratt Jr. Several others of interest are scheduled, however, for the days between Christmas and New Year's.

Miss Winchester, who is a granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dallas Bache Pratt, with whom she has made her home since the death of her parents, will become the bride of Mr. Pratt on Wednesday afternoon in Grace Church, which was also the scene of the marriage of her parents, the late Mr. and Mrs. Lycurgus Winchester. Miss Winchester will have for her matron of honor her younger sister, Mrs. J. Stewart Barney Jr., who before her marriage on May 4 in the same church was Miss Katharine Lycurgus Winchester. Her other attendants will be Mrs. Philip MacCall Parker, her cousin; Mrs. Roland Palmedo, Miss Florence Gibb Pratt, sister of Mr. Pratt, and Miss Elizabeth MacKubin of Baltimore. Mr. Pratt, who is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Lee Pratt of this city and Glen Cove, L. I., will have his brother, Frederic R. Pratt, for his best man. His ushers will be Lewis Mills Gibb and William Van A. Hester, his cousins; Allan McLane Jr., his brother-in-law; Jack Winchester, cousin of Miss Winchester; Lawrence B. Van Ingen, Sherman Trowbridge, William Harkness, John MacDuffie 2d, Ridley Watts Jr. and Andrew Varick Stout Jr.

ANOTHER marriage will take place in the Pratt family this month, that of Miss Virginia Pratt, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John T. Pratt, who is a cousin of Herbert Lee Pratt Jr., fiancé of Miss Hope Winchester. She will become the bride of Robert H. Thayer, son of the Rev. and Mrs. William Greenough Thayer of Southborough, Mass., on the afternoon of Dec. 30 in St. Bartholomew's Church. The ceremony will be performed by Mr. Thayer's father, who is headmaster of St. Mark's School. A small reception will follow at the home of the bride's parents, 7 East Sixty-first Street.

Miss Sally Pratt will be maid of honor for her sister. The other bridal attendants will be Mrs. John T. Pratt Jr., Mrs. Edward N. Ohl Jr., the Misses Phyllis Pratt, also a sister of Miss Pratt; Constance Miller, Caroline Clark, Evelyn Lanman, Elizabeth Hyde, Grace Wrenn, Ruth Pruyn and Helen Moseley.

MANY entertainments will be given for Miss Bertha Benkard and Reginald Parry Rose in advance of their marriage on Dec. 29 in Grace Church. Miss Susanne Tiffin, who will be one of the bridesmaids, will give a luncheon today for them at her home, and Miss Elsie Barber, another of the bridesmaids, will give a dinner on Dec. 24 at her home. Mrs. George Rose, mother of Mr. Rose, will give a dinner for the entire bridal party on Dec. 27 at her home. Miss Mary Peters, who will be maid of honor, gave a luncheon on Friday at her home for Miss Benkard. The other bridal attendants will be Miss Katharine Steele, Miss Katherine Cook, Miss Gwendolyn Rose, sister of Mr. Rose, and Miss Phyllis Benkard, cousin of Miss Benkard. George Rose Jr. will be best man for his brother. There will be twelve ushers, Randolph F. Burke, George H. Cook, William Palmer Dixon, Philip Hale, Clifford V. Brokaw Jr., Duncan Ellsworth, John Sloa, Willis Bird Dunscombe Duncan, John Richardson Ledyard S. Smith and Franklin Benkard, brother of Miss Benkard.

SUPPER DANCE TO AID DUG-OUT

A SUPPER dance for the benefit of the Dug Out will be given at the Club Mirador Tuesday with Maurice and Eleonora Ambrose in a program of dances. The Dug Out was founded for the purpose of aiding disabled service men. Many tables have been reserved for the night by persons well known in the city's social life. Applications for tables may be made to Mrs. Charles de Rham Jr., 309 Park Avenue, or at the Club Mirador.

Mrs. Robert Weeks Kelley is President of the Dug-Out, Miss Cottenet is Vice President, Stephen H. Pell Treasurer and Mrs. Charles de Rham Jr. Secretary.

THEATRE FUND AIDS JEWISH WELFARE

THE CONSTANT NYMPH," now at the Selwyn Theatre, has been taken over for the night of Jan. 6 by the Committee for Supplementary Aid for the Jewish Widows of the Board of Child Welfare. Following the performance, there will be a supper with dancing on the theatre stage. Mrs. William A. Bandler is Chairman of the Committee for Arrangements.

Mrs. Charles Oppenheimer, 1,067 Fifth Avenue, has charge of the tickets.

OVERSEAS AVIATORS HOLD ANNUAL BALL

THE eighth annual Overseas Aviators' Ball, under the auspices of the First Reserve Aero Squadron, of which Dr. E. Garnsey Brownell is President, will be held on Jan. 6 at the Waldorf-Astoria. The entire proceeds will go to the Dug Out, a workshop and home for soldiers disabled during the war.

Also on the Board of Officers of the Association are John A. Straley, Vice President, William H. Walling, Secretary, and D. Stearns Jamison Jr., Treasurer. The members of the Executive Committee are John B. Chevalier, Daniel P. Morse Jr., Robert M. Olyphant, and J. Dwight Sullivan. Mrs. Charles Addison Miller is Chairman of the Patronesses Committee, and Thomas Washington Ward is Chairman of the ushers.

GIFT ADVISER AIDS SHOPPER TO SELECT

THE gift adviser in the person of a persuasive young woman of ideas has a cosy little office of her own in one of the Fifth Avenue department stores. Shoppers at their wits' end for original suggestions come here to confer over a businesslike desk.

Some people found their way to her in time to present their entire Christmas lists and thus with expert aid got their shopping over with minimum expenditure of worry.

Men were principally in mind when the bureau was opened—busy men with no time to look around, men with no gift ideas of their own, lonely men with no one to whom to pass the shopping burden—and men soon found their way to it. The gift adviser finds them nervous and ill at ease at first. If giving has any joy for men, getting the gifts has not, she is sure; but with a cigarette in the privacy of her office they soon get down to work, making all those revelations necessary for the enlightenment of one selecting gifts for unknown people.

In the course of many such conversations she has learned a surprising thing about herself. No matter who the lady is to receive the gift, invariably she is "just about your size."

Men in search of gifts, according to the adviser, fall rather sharply into two classes; there are those who lean heavily toward lingeries and those who lean just as heavily the other way. One shopper, seated stiffly on the edge of his chair, announced all in one breath that he had come for "a gift for a young woman—not hosiery, underwear or perfume." Eventually he went away content with a conservative handbag.

One of the toughest problems the adviser had to handle was that of a gift for a woman who lived abroad and had to have something typically American. A canvass of most things in the store revealed few that were not made as good or better abroad, but after a while an American print filled the order. Then there was a gift for an invalid who had everything people usually give to invalids. A bright tea set saved the day. Another woman, having bought almost everything, was blocked by lack of ideas for her maids. One was 65 years old and the other 19, and she wanted to give them both the same thing. The gift adviser's suggestion of sweaters took a great load off her mind.

Many a day the gift adviser has to think up some dozen or so original ideas for people who are generally described as either surfeited with possessions or extremely exacting in their tastes. And she is not at all sure that the passing of Christmas will put an end to this necessity for racking her brain, since the need has manifested itself for gift advice for other occasions. Wedding anniversaries, especially, present difficulties. One of the bureau's first patrons was seeking a wedding anniversary present for his wife—something "strictly personal." After numerous suggestions, he decided on bath salts.

If the adviser is going to do any serious delving into anniversary problems, though, she feels sure she will have to do some inventing.

TRIANGLES TO PLAY HERE

Princeton Dramatic Club Will Present a Comic Opera at the Metropolitan

THE Princeton University Triangle Club will present the comic opera "Samarkand" at its annual appearance in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House Tuesday afternoon and evening and again on the evening of Jan. 4.

The action of the play, written by Samuel T. Carter 3d, centres around a conspiracy instigated against an Oriental ruler by his trusted wazir. It involves, among other things, the welfare of the Princess, the Caliph's fair and coveted daughter.

Avery Sherry Jr., '27, who last year played the part of Rosetta in the production of "Fortuno," will appear as the Princess, and L. B. Braman, '28, will interpret the rôle of Yasmini, the court dancing girl, whose aid the wazir attempts to enlist in his plotting against the Caliph and the Princess.

Hugo L. Bell, '27, who was in last year's cast and in the chorus of the show the previous year, will play the part of Haroun, the Caliph of Ashkahad; Frank A. Baker, '28, will take the rôle of Raschild, the supposedly trusty wazir, and William Brenton, '27, will appear as Attah Beybey, a magician in the Caliph's household, and who gains in importance as the plot progresses.

The rôles of Zahirudin, an adventurer, and Peke Abou, his loyal supporter, will be taken by Morgan S. A. Reichner, '28, and Franklin Gary, '27, respectively. James D. Bartlett, '27, will interpret the comic rôle of Hidan Sikh, a companion to Peke Abou and Zahirudin.

Among the song numbers which are expected to prove hits are "Golden Caravan" and "The Road to Samarkand," the thematic song of the production, both of which have been written by Herbert C. Sanford, '27, the President of the club. E. H. Harbison, '28, author of last year's hit, "Twilight," has composed three numbers, "The Magic of Your Eyes," "Melody Moon" and "Desert Melody."

A Ballet Introduced.

A feature of the music will be a ballet immediately before the finale. This experiment was inaugurated last year by Sanford and met with such popularity that the idea is being continued this year.

It may be of interest to note that the audience will get its first impression of the much-talked-of "constructivism" at the opening of the second act. The curtain rises on an enchanted garden in Samarkand, with the chorus grouped about on the different levels singing "The Hymn of the Fire Worshipers," written by Sanford.

Others who have contributed to the score are H. A. Royster, '27, and H. S. Redmond, '27, who is the author of a catchy tune entitled "Dancing Girl." In addition, lyrics are being written by S. Carter, '27, and I. W. Thompson, '28.

The Triangle Club was founded in 1892 with Booth Tarkington, '93, as its first President. It has devoted itself to the field of musical comedy, and each year presents a play which is entirely the work of the undergraduates, from the writing of the book to the construction of the scenery and to the arrangements of a 4,000-mile itinerary.

ONLY AN EXPERT CAN TIE CRAVATS

MUCH besides financing goes on in Wall Street. For instance, when 3 o'clock has struck, the Stock Exchange has closed and the partners have departed for the day, some of the boys gather in the back office with serious business in hand. From pockets and drawers a gay array of silk and poplin is produced, ties, scarves and four-in-hands, bright, dull, dotted, striped or checked. Then develops a scene like that which takes place in any fraternity house just before a dance. The champion tie-tier gets to work.

With patience and paints has he learned his art. This accomplishment he puts at the disposal of companions. He does not attempt to teach them, but he gives them the benefit of what he has learned, ties their four-in-hands for them, beautifully, correctly.

For some time thereafter the evidence of his skill is preserved. No one would thoughtlessly undo neckwear arranged with such success. The knot is merely slipped, the loop lifted over the head and the scarf carefully hung up—to be slipped on again without another tying.

For New Year's Fete

Bienvenue à Québec

IT IS "Jour de l'an"—New Year's—Quebec's day of the year. Finale of the Christmas holidays.

The snow-shoe clubs parade. Ski-ers rove ahead. A hundred variegated uniforms shine vivid against the snow. On to a giant figure in ice. King Winter is crowned in colorful ceremony. Merriment rings to the sky.

Night falls. Bells peal. The toboggan slide bursts into light. Laughing sled-loads whiz down. The skating rink grows live, to the accompaniment of moon and music . . . Finally, into the Chateau. Fires blaze. Good cheer prevails. And the celebration climaxes in the famous New Year's Ball.

Oh, it's a stirring, thrilling time in a stirring, thrilling place. A time of glorious sport in the snows, tingling runs under the stars, clubby gatherings in the great castled hotel. Through Pullmans. Immediate reservations suggested.

BIG TREES ATTAIN GREAT AGE

One Big California Redwood Is Believed to Be About Four Thousand Years Old

PROBABLY the most distinguished living tree in all the world, and the best known, is the General Sherman Sequoia, or Big Tree, in the Sequoia National Park of California. This specimen of one of the longest-lived tree families known is nearly thirty-seven feet in diameter, and its mighty shaft towers close to 300 feet in the air. While its exact age will never be known positively, until the tree is felled, forestry experts have reckoned the monarch to be approximately 4,000 years old.

The Big Trees attain enormous size and great age, and are without question the most magnificent specimens of the vegetable kingdom in North America. A cross-section of the butt of a Big Tree is in the American Museum of Natural History. This tree had a basal circumference of ninety feet and a height of 350 feet. Its age was found to be 1,341 years. Lumbermen have estimated that the bole contained 400,000 board feet of lumber.

In addition to the sequoias, several other families have venerable members. The yews of Europe, the locust trees of Brazil and the cypress trees of Mexico, while perhaps less well known than are the sequoias of California, attain age equally great. The Big Cypress of Tule in the State of Oaxaca, Mexico, has a circumference of a trifle more than 150 feet, but its height is only about 125 feet. A conservative estimate of the age of this cypress is given as 4,000 years, and some estimates place it as high as 6,000. Undoubtedly it is one of the oldest living things on earth.

Foresters reckoning the age of a certain yew tree in Perthshire, Scotland, have concluded it can hardly be less than 3,000 years, and may be as much as 4,000. A scientist recently stated that in all probability this tree was a seedling when men of the early Stone Age inhabited Scotland's rugged hills, and bears and bisons roamed the woods of Britain. The oldest oak in England is the Cowthorpe Oak, near Wetherly, in Yorkshire. Its hollow trunk is said to be capable of holding seventy people, and it is thought to be at least 1,600 years old.

The famous Sherwood Forest, near Nottingham, contained a dense stand of aged and huge oaks and yews, which are said to have sheltered and provided a haven for Robin Hood and his merry fellows during the reign of Richard the Lion Hearted. Since the war many of these trees have fallen.

As most schoolboys, especially those in rural sections, know, the age of a felled tree is ascertained by counting the number of annual rings on a stump from the centre outward to the bark. Trees of the temperate zone lay on their growth in Spring and early Summer; in Fall and Winter the growth ceases and a clearly defined ring is formed. A forester's method of estimating the age of standing timber is by using an increment borer. This is a steel instrument that works on the principle of the auger. The forester bores into the trunk of a tree, making only a minute hole, then withdraws the borer, bringing with it a slender core of wood. This core shows the number of annual rings in the distance bored, on which an estimate is based for the whole diameter.

While the average person usually associates great size in trees with great age the opposite condition is not infrequently found.

WORKING MOTHERS ARE STUDIED BY EXPERTS

Two Investigations Suggest That Professional Women Can Combine Home and Job, While Wage-Earners Cannot

THE tide of conscious interest in the American home and its component parts—marriage, mothers, children and fathers—rises higher with every moon. If there ever was a time when homes were taken for granted, when their pattern was established and their purpose unquestioned, it has vanished as surely as fireplace cookery and the spinning wheel.

For some time it has been the fashion to accuse various forces of striking a body blow at the sacred institution. The industrial system, higher education, woman suffrage, the new psychology, all have come in for their share of blame. Emotion and prejudice ran high, but actual facts in any number were conspicuously lacking. It is only within a comparatively short time that theories, and what Henshaw Ward calls "thobbing," have shown signs of giving way to genuine analysis and scientific study.

The immediate and almost instinctive retort to the fact that, according to 1920 census figures, 2,000,000 married women are gainfully employed in the United States has been that the economic independence of women is wrecking the American home. Batteries of theory and individual instances were brought in as evidence on both sides until it became obvious that the thing most needed was unbiased knowledge. The heated question, "Should a woman work?" cooled to the most fruitful "What happens if she does?" And various agencies went to work to find out.

One of them, the Bureau of Vocational Information, has just published a report on "Marriage and Careers" which deals with the results of an intensive study of more than a hundred professional women who had homes, husbands and children. Its provocative conclusion, coming at the end of grave tables and vivid discussion, is that "a woman can hold a full-time well paid job and run a comfortable, contented, happy home besides."

Taking Less Sanguine View.

Other investigators are not so sanguine. The Women's Bureau of the department, speaking of women in industry, says that when women work outside "the home and family life is being menaced from the point of view of both health and happiness." The Child Study Association of America recently heard Dr. Florence Bamberger of Johns Hopkins University say that "the mother should build up the home around the child and give her exclusive time to the rearing of her children."

The report of the Bureau of Vocational Information, which was made by Virginia MacMakin Collier, is especially pertinent, not only for its controversial ideas and its almost revolutionary conclusion, but also because it presents certain elusive facts. It gives a faithful and vivid picture of the way in which a hundred women are carrying on an experiment whose results may be as important in the future of the American home as was the Franklin stove or the electric lamp.

In the course of this study Mrs. Collier interviewed each of the hundred women—saw her home, talked with her husband, in many cases with her children. She chose them at qualified random from New York, Boston and near-by college towns. She picked the professional group rather than any other class because persons of the type "probably represent the advance guard in any attempt to cope with woman's present-day problems." Also she wanted to keep the cases as nearly homogeneous as possible and therefore insisted that women be selected who were receiving pay for their work. Three-quarters of them had professional training and experience behind them when they married. No volunteer, regardless of the hours she spent in church, club or organization work, was included.

Many of the hundred—28 to be exact—were teachers, almost as many, 25, were following some form of art, 12 were selling things that ranged from patent household devices to real estate, 11 were engaged in the selfless and poorly paid profession of social work, 7 were doing research, medical, psychological or anthropological work; 5 were lawyers, 3 were doctors, 10 (one the Dean of Women at New England University) were lumped together under the all-inclusive "miscellaneous."

Hard to Strike Average.

The majority, 66 per cent., were doing full-time work. Salaries ranged from under $1,000 a year for part-time and poorly paid work to nearly $20,000 for the expert product of a highly successful artist in a popular field. With so wide a range it was almost impossible to strike an average that would have any meaning, but the median line fell between $2,000 and $3,000 a year.

Picked because they were professional women, it followed naturally that these were persons of education and intelligence. Coincidentally, most of them belonged to a favored economic group and could employ servants. Only nine were without at least one helper, and forty-two of the women had two servants or more. Their lives were so arranged that the actual work they had to do to keep house and care for the children was reduced to a minimum, and they would have had much day time leisure had it not been for their professions. They differed from their sisters and neighbors in similar circumstances in that they preferred to fill this leisure with something more exacting and satisfying than bridge, matinees, or "culture courses."

It was out of the personal experience of these women that Mrs. Collier drew the facts which, individual and isolated as they are, do give a picture of the kind of homes these women make, and their reasons why it is both possible and desirable for them to carry the double burden of home and job.

It is a common theory that no woman works unless she has to, unless the income of the man of the family will not cover expenses even when it is stretched at the corners and spread thin in the middle. But this report shows only eight of the total number of a hundred working solely on account of financial necessity. Thirty more agreed that economic pressure was a factor in the matter; they wanted better schools or larger houses or more advantages for their children; but these were minor things, and the impelling cause was very different.

Two Chief Motives.

An outlet for energy and the desire for a richer content of life are the heads under which Mrs. Collier grouped the motivating reasons why ninety-two women were engaged in professions. Some of them had creative gifts that would not be denied; some were as frankly ambitious as their husbands; some were such excellent executives that housework was a matter only of minutes, leaving them faced with empty days. Some were openly not fond of undiluted domesticity; others found their children growing up and their hands idle. Some felt that they owed it to their families to keep themselves interesting and stimulating; others wanted the most modern educational advantages for their children and could get them only by personal work with schools.

That one discovery—that 92 per cent. of these women found the job of wife and mother inadequate and unsatisfactory if they kept it within four walls—is emphasized as one of the most valuable things in the whole study. It points a vivid finger at the changes, almost unrealized, that have taken place in the American home.

"Perhaps," says Mrs. Collier, "just because she has a professional angle from which she sometimes views her family, the kind of woman included in this study is more aware of the possibilities and implications of family life than is her non-professional sister." And again: "The mother who is doing something beside bringing up children is at the trial bar. As one woman candidly admits, 'Such a one is apt to be a better mother because she cannot afford to slip up.'"

What Husbands Think.

Eighty-six of the hundred husbands were found to "entertain a decidedly favorable attitude" toward the unconventional fact of a professional wife. There is nothing passive about this attitude. It includes a distinct pride in the wife's business accomplishments. It means a working partnership in the domestic routine.

Only one husband was definitely opposed to his wife's work—and his opposition concerned merely the kind of work she was doing. Two husbands were indifferent, believing that their wives had the human right to plan their own lives. Eleven, though not convinced that the experiment had proved successful, were willing that it should go on.

The children of these homes range in age from babies up to college students. Mrs. Collier found them all lacking the earmarks of neglected children. "The interviewer met well-mannered young children, obviously enchanted with their mothers; and she observed integrated family groups where older children had been drawn into the interests of both parents until the family functioned as a unit."

Four Conclusions.

In its conclusions, the report sets out the conditions these women found indispensable in their own experiences. "They are: (1) sympathetic cooperation from the husband, (2) good health, (3) good training and experience before marriage, (4) short or flexible hours of work." Lacking any one of the four, joy in accomplishment would be likely to sour into drudgery, and the price grow too heavy for the game.

If this study mirrors accurately the state of affairs in the homes of professional matrons—and its author claims no more for it than that it is a truthful picture of a picked hundred—it presents a violent contrast to the state of affairs in the homes of married women who work in industry. About the time Mrs. Collier was visiting her teachers and artists and editors the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, under Mary Anderson, was making a detailed study of the family status of bread-winning women in four selected cities—Jacksonville, Fla.; Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Butte, Mont., and Passaic, N. J.

The material for the study was drawn from the 1920 census report, except in the case of Passaic, where the bureau made a special study. Nearly 40,000 women were "gainfully employed" in those four cities, and of that number 11,060 were married and had children.

There is a marked difference of attitude between the Bureau of Vocational Information and the Women's Bureau over the fact of women carrying the double burden of family and job. Where the former sees happier families the latter sees overworked women, neglected children; and it warns: "There is something radically wrong with the economic situation in the country when so many mothers with a husband living in the family circle, presumably as chief supporter, are undoubtedly forced to engage in gainful labor."

The Economic Deficit.

The Women's Bureau takes the traditional stand that "the welfare of home and family life is a woman-sized job in itself" and regards it as a fact of common knowledge that "any diversion of the function of the home to bread-winning purposes (such as taking in lodgers) impinges upon its efficiency as a place of relaxation and of nurture of family life."

"It is obviously," this bureau asserts, "that many of the problems connected with bread-winning wives and mothers would be dissipated if the husbands and fathers were to receive a wage adequate for the family needs."

The study of careers, homes and home-makers has made its way into two of the women's colleges. Vassar established a course in euthenics two years ago, and after its flourishing existence this year as an intensive Summer institute, it is now housed in a new building of its own. Its keynote is the application of scientific knowledge and methods to home-making. It studies ways and means of making life a fuller, rounder thing, richer for the individual and more valuable to society.

Smith College has approached the matter from a different viewpoint. Under the leadership of Dr. Ethel Puffer Howes it established the Institute for the Coordination of Women's Interests. It bases its work on the results of wide-flung questionnaires and long preliminary study, and it is still carrying on research into the possibility and the advisability of trying to combine a career with a home.

Metropolitan Museum Reports a Greatly Increased Roll of Students Interested in Practical Applications of Art

IS America becoming art conscious? Or is she merely beginning to have the leisure necessary for art explorations? The increased number of permits issued each year by the Metropolitan Museum of Art for the privilege of studying its masterpieces would indicate a rapidly growing taste for beautiful things. The year 1925 saw an increase of 2,000 permits over 1924 and an increased attendance of 100,000. Current year figures are expected to exceed those of last year.

But statistics rarely tell the whole story. There are many persons who go to the museum for inspiration, counsel or consultation, not checked up by the turning gate. One has been long accustomed to the occasional quiet worker, paint brush in hand, faithfully reproducing the gallery's paintings. Today visitors are impressed by the large groups of interested students daily poring over the exhibits and transferring them to sketchbook and canvas. From the city's high schools and colleges come these searchers after art. They come from the business world. For designer and manufacturer now go to the museum to talk over their problems with experts.

There is no branch of art neglected by these present-day students. Persian rugs and Damascene brass, Far Eastern porcelains and ancient armor, all receive their share of attention. The handiwork of old craftsmen is studied and molded into designs. Egyptian bangles and Turkish filigree divide honors with more elaborate ornamentation for modern use. The industrial no less than the fine arts are lending new inspiration to future producers. Sports ribbons for Southampton may owe their colors and patterns to Persian lacquered book covers. Men's cravats for Fifth Avenue shops take on distinction from the study of Chinese cloisonné vases. Designers with wit enough to eschew copybook duplication build their designs from old masters. The process may lead through many stages, but they achieve distinction, say experts, in the final result, whether it be wallpaper made in Brooklyn or painted furniture made in New England.

New Designs for Old.

Those who come to the museum to paint and sketch today are not all copiers. Far from it. Many are creating twentieth-century designs from patterns evolved by fourteenth-century goldsmiths and weavers. Printed voiles and woven cotton blankets, soap wrappers and bottle labels are but a few of the modern necessities now showing the influence of the world's fine arts.

Cross-legged on polished floor sits the schoolgirl with paper-pad on knee. Others, more provident, perch on low stools in front of small easels. These students are rounding out their academic course by field work at the museum. All ages are found in the class rooms and at the lectures.

Mondays and Fridays one usually sees the largest groups of young students scattered through the museum rooms. One class may be concentrating on the primitives of old Italian painters, another on illuminated texts. Or they may be following a chapter in the history of art in one of the four classrooms. These classrooms, under the supervision of the director of educational work, are used by teachers and pupils from New York's public schools and colleges, by out-of-town students or by other groups of art enthusiasts. Here pupils receive instruction both from their own teachers and from museum experts. Their time at the museum may be divided between classroom and exhibits or devoted entirely to the latter.

Saturday and Sunday draw the largest lecture crowds, for on these days the adult worker, busy during the week, is free. At the practical talks, as they are called, given each Sunday, one finds persons interested in a wide diversity of subjects. Dressmakers, clerks from department stores, interior decorators, housewives, the specialist, all these come for information and assistance. From November to March there are Saturday afternoon lectures on the history of design and on the bigger subject of the history of art. The connoisseur, it is pointed out, has always gone to museums for both information and inspiration, as well as for pleasure. The practical person now goes for the same things, but there is another reason. He is looking for practical help.

Liaison Officer.

It was for this reason that a few years ago the department of industrial arts was added to the museum's other branches of art. The growing demands of designer and manufacturer for help with their problems led museum authorities to appoint a liaison officer, who would help translate the exhibits in terms of industry's needs. It is the duty of this staff member to acquaint himself with the difficulties and methods of manufacture and selling and with changing production processes. Richard Bach, associate in industrial arts at the museum, says the problem is one of intelligent assimilation. If the designer is a mere copyist the museum will give him little inspiration. Such a worker will find lace ideas only in lace, textile ideas only in fabrics. But if he is a digger, a searcher after patterns made by old craftsmen, he will originate designs from objects having little apparent relation to the modern object he is decorating—as, for instance, the cretonne that gets its inspiration from chased metal; the pattern of grass floor mats that may have been suggested to a designer by Japanese peaked helmets. The mind of the style-maker hurdles several centuries in working out his designs.

No longer does the manufacturer consider the museum a formidable monument. Today it is said to be his workroom, his laboratory of design, a mine, in fact, where unexpected treasures may be dug up.

TESTS SHOW THAT WATCHES LAST TWO GENERATIONS IF CARED FOR

POSSIBLY no mechanism ever invented by man is so reliable and durable as the modern watch movement. Even the cheaper forms of watches run for years with regularity. Modern factories are equipped with thousands of machines whose life of usefulness cannot approach that of the watch. Yet watches are constantly carried about, changed to countless positions and subjected to wear and tear such as no other mechanism meets.

Tests made recently demonstrated that by giving a watch a reasonable amount of care, its service will be greatly prolonged. It may last the average lifetime of a man and be handed on to the next generation almost as good as new. This has been found to be the case not alone with expensive watch movements, but with the watch of comparatively low cost.

Records of watchmakers show that the average watch is more neglected than any other mechanism in personal use. Scarcely one man in a hundred takes his watch to the jewelers for inspection until it begins to show unmistakable signs of breakdown or total prostration. The same man who neglects his watch would not think of driving an automobile for many days or many thousand miles without having it cleaned and looked over. A regular diagnosis of one's watch, it is asserted, doubles, perhaps quadruples, its life.

LOG DRUMS BEAT VOODOO TATTOO CALLING HAYTIANS TO CANE FIELDS

TONICAL drums fashioned from hollow logs and almost identical with those of the savage tribes of the Congo are now reverbating in every village occupied by Haytian laborers in the sugar cane fields of the Dominican Republic.

These drums sound the rising call at the first streak of dawn and speed the worker to his day of toil. At night they gladden his primitive heart with the throbbing beat of the voodoo dance, when the tropic moon shines down. The drums are thumped at weddings and on various festal occasions. When a coffin is carried to its resting place by drunken, dancing bearers, drums sound in joyous cadence to obliterate the solemnity of death.

Often the drummer sits on the instrument and hammers it with both hands. Sometimes it is placed with the pointed end down between the musician's bare feet, so that it may be raised and lowered by them, thus producing a muffled or staccato sound.

Early in December the average Haytian cane-cutter is prone to go into trances or indulge in wild spasms of dancing. During such periods he becomes angry if called by his own name and answers only to another which has been conferred on him by his particular voodoo priest or priestess.

Certain voodoo cults also perform the fire dance and are apparently able to hop about on red hot coals without injury, after the manner of the fire walkers of the Philippines, Hawaii, Japan and Ceylon. As far as is known, science has no explanation of this power, although a white American was recently admitted to the fire walking fraternity of the Philippines.

While physically small and undernourished, the Haytian can cut cane all day and dance practically all night without showing much fatigue—as long, that is, as he is encouraged by the beating of the drum. His dances are not of the happy variety of the American negro, but are wildly barbaric, starting slowly and ending in almost demoniac frenzy. There is little mixed blood among those who leave their mountain homes and emigrate to Dominica. Jet black and densely ignorant, they are prototypes of the original slaves imported from Africa by the French planters of long ago. Their patois is said to consist of only 200 words and many of these are of African origin. Strange to say, for all their savagery, these Haytians are extremely docile, appearing thus in direct contrast to the Dominican negroes and those from the British West Indies, who are often pugnacious.

NEW BUILDINGS IN PICCADILLY

TWO noteworthy new buildings have just been completed in Piccadilly, London. One is the new home of the Automobile Association and has taken three years to erect. Twenty years ago this organization had 100 members; today 315,000 motorists are enrolled.

The other building is devoted to cooperative apartments and is called Devonshire House. It has every known convenience. Two artesian wells, each 500 feet deep, provide the flats with additional water, making them independent, if necessary, of the main London supply. There are fourteen elevators and every bedroom has its own bath. The heating system is unobtrusive—in fact no radiators or registers are visible. The cheapest of these cooperative apartments was sold for about $20,000, the most expensive for about $125,000. All were taken before the building was finished.

RARE BOOK COLLECTOR SURVEYS AMERICAN LIFE

Dr. Vollbehr, Who Brought the Literary Atmosphere of the Fifteenth Century With Him, Likes the Spirit of Growth

By ELSIE WEIL.

SEEING America as others see us is a lively and amiable art and no longer a seasonal occupation, now that foreigners, titled or lettered, constantly come and go. They leave behind them a trail of smart epigrams, clapping or bouquueting, according to whim. Frequently the critical barometer rises and falls with the box receipts of the parting guests.

But seldom has a visitor given in more gracious or generous spirit, with the expectation of receiving nothing in return, than has Dr. Otto H. F. Vollbehr of Berlin, whose exhibition of fifteenth century books at the National Arts Club attracted the attention of book connoisseurs throughout the country.

The distinguished bibliophile, who owns the finest private collection of incunabula in the world, has introduced a strange word to America. A few months ago even groups of the literati thought incunabula was a new kind of breakfast food. Now incunabula trips lightly into everyday conversation.

Wherever Dr. Vollbehr goes it has become a habit (born of fifteen years of eager search) for him to inquire for incunabula. In one flourishing bookstore of the Middle West he walked down a wide aisle, flanked with perilous pyramids of American tragedies, show boats and "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes." "Incunabula?" repeated the knowing clerk blandly. "No, we haven't any books dealing with those people."

Dr. Vollbehr is a modest man and he does not wear his modesty as a gesture. "They say I am an expert on incunabula." He dismisses the matter with a deprecatory shrug.

A Striking Contrast.

His suite in a Fifth Avenue hotel was equipped with electric light and plumbing seons removed from the fifteenth century, but incongruities faded as Dr. Vollbehr's glowing enthusiasm re-created quiet old monastery cloisters and those first European printers who made books for all time. All the visitors' books had been packed more carefully than crown jewels for their journey back to Germany, or, rather, not quite all; for here and there on a table or open desk lay a massive tome with protruding knobs and clasps. One can quite understand. It would be impossible to be separated from all one's precious incunabula, even for the duration of an ocean journey.

Impetuously Dr. Vollbehr brought out a priceless little book that ought to be the cornerstone of some great American library. "This," he said, turning to the title page, "is the book in which the name America was first suggested for the new-found world." It was an introduction to cosmography, including an account of the four voyages of Americus Vespucius. Technically it could not be included in the incunabula, for it bore the date 1507, but it was the first book printed at Saint Dié in Lorraine and its sentimentally historical value can not be discounted.

The book led to a discussion of present-day America. Dr. Vollbehr is a man of dynamic energy who takes a keen interest in the world around him. He is not at all the detached bibliophile of tradition. If he had not devoted himself to the fascinating pursuit of cornering incunabula he might have concentrated with equal efficiency on cornering rubber or some other commodity of the industrial world.

The American Spirit.

"What I like about America," he said, restlessly moving about the room as he talked, "is the spirit of going ahead and growth; what the Italians call passando, a bursting forth. You have no stick-in-the-mud. You reach forth to overcome obstacles. The struggle for existence is much stronger and fiercer here than in Europe. But that is what life should be. It appeals to me strongly.

"I have traveled so much and seen so much that I am a little blasé. Certainly I am not easily moved. But life in America astounds and overwhelms me. When I read of a project to build a 240-story building, which will cover five blocks and house 250,000 people—the total population of Hanover—I put my hands to my head. I am used to big things here, but I cannot follow this. I am still European enough to doubt how far this kind of thing can go.

"The other day I was taken to the Historical Society, where I saw a series of paintings symbolizing the development and ambitions of man. The first was a quiet landscape; the second, a city like New York; then followed a representation of excess, with extravagant festivals and life keyed to a high pitch; in the fourth, an earthquake destroyed everything, and the last was a calm landscape like the first. Then I thought of America and the danger of overreaching and collapsing back to primitive life. People grow strong only through pulling themselves up through hard times. Luxury is the enemy of all advance. America must guard against a too rapidly increasing materialism. It is almost a temptation to the gods."

Dr. Vollbehr has had an opportunity to study America from various angles. He has wintered many times in California. It was his friend, Alfred Sutro, former Mayor of San Francisco and donor of the famous Sutro Library, who first stimulated him to collect books. On this last trip he has observed America in the white heat of various emotional experiences, from the Eucharistic Congress to elocutions and the entertainment of Queen Marie.

A Deceptive Book.

"I am often asked by Americans if I ever purchase old books in the United States," he said. "Americans are buyers, not sellers, of incunabula, and I seldom expect a rare find in the market here. One day when I was walking through the streets of Seattle, I was fascinated by a show window filled with books in beautiful old bindings, among them a splendid old tome with medieval clasps. I had unexpectedly stumbled on a treasure house of fifteenth century books. I walked into the shop and said to the proprietor: 'I am interested in old and rare books. Have you any more like that one in the window?'

"'Plenty of them.' His eyes twinkled. He took the book from the window and handed it to me. I opened it. The pages had been hollowed out to fit a hip bottle. That's as close as I have come to purchasing incunabula in this country."

Many booklovers examined the exhibition of the Vollbehr incunabula at the National Arts Club. These books, with woodcuts as touching as primitive Madonnas and type that marches across the stately pages like the notes of a cathedral organ, represent not only religion and ancient classics, but all the arts as well—drama, medicine, science, romance and chivalry of the period.

Student Enthusiasm.

"At the exhibition I was delighted with the interest young people showed in these old books," said Dr. Vollbehr. "High school students came from Brooklyn and the Bronx, from private Latin schools and public schools. They pored eagerly over Ciceros and Virgils. After seeing a book printed by Gutenberg, they were eager to look at his portrait. The first editions, in their original bindings, made the study of Latin seem more real to them."

The lighter side of incunabula-viewing particularly appealed to Dr. Vollbehr. Balbus's "Catholicon," regarded by the inner circle of incunabulists as more precious than the Gutenberg Bible, was exhibited with a card identifying it as the first profane book printed by Gutenberg. A college girl—he refused to involve the college—came to Dr. Vollbehr and said: "Doctor, you read Latin, of course. Won't you kindly point out some of the profanities?"

An irate visitor created quite a scene in behalf of 100 per cent. Americanism. "What do you mean by saying that Gutenberg printed this book in 1460? Who was this Gutenberg, anyway? Don't you know that Benjamin Franklin invented the art of printing? What right have you to put up such signs?"

Dr. Vollbehr mildly suggested to the man that he read the article on printing in the Encyclopaedia Britannica. The man did not return the next day to take down the labels.

When it was announced that Dr. Vollbehr had bought the only available copy of the Gutenberg Bible for $306,000, the highest price ever paid for a printed book, letters poured in from all over the world, even from China and India, offering him "other Gutenberg Bibles," family albums, "old" Shakespeares with red initials and sundry tattered books rescued from the attic. A German wrote: "I have inherited a Gutenberg Bible, which I will sell you. I am newly married and want to start housekeeping." On investigation the Gutenberg Bible proved to be a Martin Luther Bible, published 300 years later.

Dr. Vollbehr has tremendous respect for the efficiency of the American postoffice. More than a hundred letters addressed to Mr. Foll Behr, Book Collector; Dr. Vollbehr, Bibliophile, America; Dr. Vollbehr, Lover of Books, New York, have been duly delivered at his hotel.

Praises American Collectors.

"From my experiences in traveling through the country," he remarked, "I find that, generally speaking, people here think of books in terms of best sellers. They cannot understand why any one should want old books. They do not realize that the classics are all imbedded in old books." On the other hand, Dr. Vollbehr had the highest praise for the real collectors of old books in this country.

"The late Pierpont Morgan was a bibliophile of the first water," he said. "Mr. Morgan took a real personal interest in books and probably had the best knowledge and discrimination of any American collector. Henry H. Huntington of Pasadena is the greatest collector of incunabula in America today. He has interested himself seriously in the subject and knows what he is buying. I am proud to say that the majority of the duplicates in my collection are now in the Huntington Library, the best library of incunabula in the country. Besides, the private collectors you have many experts among librarians, such as George Parker Winship of Harvard and Pierce Butler, incunabulist of the Newberry Library in Chicago."

Dr. Vollbehr's incunabula, with the addition of the Gutenberg Bible, has been valued by experts at $3,000,000.

INDIAN TRIBE TRAINED BY SYMPATHETIC PLAN

Arapahoes, on Wind River Reservation, Have Been Taken in Hand by Mission —Preparing Redmen for Useful Activity

PSYCHOLOGY is now being applied to the problem of the American Indian. Under the direction of Bishop Thomas of Wyoming, an effort is being made to create among the Arapahoes on the Wind River Reservation an Indian environment in which the red man may adapt himself to the standards of civilization, putting to practical use the training he has always received at Government schools, but has usually discarded after returning to his own home.

The work is carried on under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Profiting by failures of the past, the directors of the school have gone back to fundamentals in dealing with the Indian. In the first place, the Government has decided that they must live on reservations. There the Indian must follow the ways of industry and peace, and neither of these has yet been made particularly appealing. Since the Government must support him, the Indian has found that it is quite possible to live in a state of comparative idleness, and this has led to certain vices.

Ever since Grant was President the Episcopal Church has had spiritual charge of the Arapahoes. For more than thirty years the usual evangelical missionary work was conducted—with good results only so long as the Indians were away from home. Upon returning they reverted to type. Eight years ago St. Michael's Mission was founded. It operated first under the direction of Mrs. Baird Sumner Cooper, who thought out the plan, and is now guided by Royal H. Balcom.

Making Good Americans.

The mission's first concern is to make good Arapahoes of the Indians. With this end in view native methods and beliefs are incorporated in the plan. Racial tendencies are taken into consideration. All the mission buildings are laid out in a circle, after the manner of an Indian encampment. For the girls, the unit system is adopted, with small houses similar to those in which they will afterward live, in place of large institutional buildings. For the boys, dormitories are provided, and their training is on the farm and in the workshops. They have been taught the refinements of stock raising and farming under practical teachers, who have drawn their inspiration from the Agricultural School of the University of Wyoming. The land in the locality has been studied and sown with the most suitable crops. Beef herds, once the standard of the West, have given way to Holstein cows, more appropriate to small farms. Hogs, chickens and sheep, housed in model buildings erected by the boys themselves, have been raised so successfully as to win prizes at exhibitions.

It is held that the proof of the success of these methods has been demonstrated in the home life of graduates of the mission. Since that is the point at which most methods of Indian improvement have failed in the past, the threat of reversal to type has, it is said, been pretty well disposed of.

An Industrial Village.

The school has had little or no effect on the numerous other Indians on the reservation who have graduated from distant schools under the old methods, and their demoralizing example presents another problem. To combat that a sort of post-graduate course has been instituted, in the form of an industrial Winter village in which a small number of the more progressive men and women can be taught to live in the new environment into which they have been thrust on the mission grounds. In that village the red man can learn the trades of shoemaker, saddle maker, barber, blacksmith, &c. Moreover, the idea is to have a council house, in which the tribe will be assembled to discuss the welfare of the young people and how the village industries may be sustained.

Later on, an inn will be built in the village, and, crowning all, a church of large dimensions, for the Arapahoes are said to be the most religious people of the plains, and are the custodians of the Sacred Pipe, which is the Indian Ark of the Covenant. Already the sympathetic transfusion from the Indian religion to Christianity is being accomplished in the little log chapel of the school. On the door, emblazoned in flaming colors, are the symbols sacred to the Arapahoe: The eagle, which sees and knows all; the sun, which is translated to them as Christ, the Sun of Righteousness; the Thunder Bird, the bird of mystery. This is not the first time in the history of the world that similarities in faiths have been reconciled.

Inside the church one finds votive offerings of braided sweet grass, while in place of the conventional stained glass window a great clear pane frames a distant view of the superb Wind River Mountains, the heritage of the Arapahoes.

GHOST STORIES STILL RECALL FIRST SCENIC ROAD BUILDER

Trails Blazed by Solomon Jones in North Carolina Mountains Serve Modern Tourists

WHEN a group of children returning from a party in the picturesque mountain town of Hendersonville, N. C., late one night recently told a story of seeing a towering man, with long, flowing hair, beating through the brush in the vicinity of Mount Hebron, following a great razor-backed sow, whose tail he held in his left hand, while with his right hand he swung an axe from side to side, parents were not unduly alarmed.

To the parents of one of the children, natives of the Hendersonville section of the Blue Ridge country, "the ghost with the axe" recalled the story of Solomon Jones. Interrogation of the returned youthful celebraters revealed that the story of the mountain patriarch and the sow had been one of several related at the party during the evening, and that the "apparition" was the development of juvenile imagination.

While there are few people superstitious enough to believe that Solomon Jones's ghost haunts Mount Hebron, every old-timer in the section will agree that the spirit of the rugged mountaineer, who lived to near the century mark, is everywhere manifest in the great modern hard-surfaced highways radiating through the mountains in every direction. For Solomon Jones possesses the distinction of being the first American scenic road builder whose pursuit was so recognized. Tradition holds that his razor-backed sow, Sue, was his chief engineer.

His Winding Roads.

To those who like to romance of the past, Solomon Jones is referred to as the "trail blazer." His trails of yesteryear are a State's great highways of today, and the slashing of his hatchet reverberates today through the mountain gaps in the pounding of road-making machinery.

Whether it is true that when about to build a road, Solomon Jones gripped his razor-backed sow, Sue, by the tail and followed her over the mountains, hacking a trail as he went, will always be a matter of dispute before mountain firesides, but noted surveyors and civil engineers who have visited Henderson County have marveled at the fact that old Solomon's roads followed the lowest grades and found the natural gaps through the mountains, which accounts for their continuous winding—sometimes almost like a spiral stairway in their regularity.

Although Solomon Jones blazed trails as far back as the days shortly following the War of 1812 while he was still in his teens, it was about fifty years ago that he completed his first scenic road. This is the road to the lofty summit of Mount Hebron—to the tomb of the old mountaineer. It was the most popular drive taken by residents of Hendersonville and visitors in the days of horse drawn vehicles. Automobiles even today make the summit over this road, but most of the motorists, excepting those aspiring toward hazards, prefer to stay on the wider hard-surfaced highways, the outgrowth of Solomon's idea. Among the many other roads built by Solomon Jones was Jones's Gap, named for him, which leads to Caesar's Head in the Carolinas. This was constructed long before the Civil War and for more than 60 years was used by Jones and his heirs as a toll road.

Father of Twelve Children.

The road maker was well termed the "grand old man of the mountains." He was, indeed, a patriarch. Standing six feet two inches tall and weighing 200 pounds and gifted with keen intellect, he was a man who commanded the respect of all who knew him. The father of twelve children, ten sons and two daughters, he was credited with adopting and bringing up seven other orphan children left to his care.

He was 97 years of age when death claimed him, but in his usual far-sighted manner he had looked ahead to the end. Some time before his death the tomb at the top of Mount Hebron was completed—even to the epitaph—which had been engraved on it, except for the date of death, by James Blythe, a printer of those days and the father of Judge O. V. F. Blythe of Hendersonville. The epitaph engraved by Blythe reads:

Here Lies
SOLOMON JONES,
The Road Maker.
A True Patriot.
He Labored 50
Years to Leave the World Better
Than He Found It.
Born March 7, 1802
and Died
April 28, 1890.

Solomon Jones, becaues of his large family, which he wished to see well educated, turned naturally to schools. He was one of the pioneers in educational work, stumping Western North Carolina in an effort to get the present public school system established. He thus early recognized the fact that if the mountain farmer was to improve his condition, it would be through the combination of good schools and roads.

BRIDGES OF ALL SORTS SPAN MISSISSIPPI

FROM the source of the Mississippi River, far up in the wilds of Northern Minnesota, to the Gulf of Mexico more than 120 bridges, large and small, have been thrown across the Father of Waters. They range from a tiny twelve-foot crossing at Bena, near the headwaters, to the huge spans at St. Paul, St. Louis and Memphis.

There is a spiral bridge at Hastings, Minn.—a loop-the-loop affair that gives motorists crossing it for the first time something to tax their skill. Several toll bridges are still operated, but for the most part these have been done away with. Bridge building over the Mississippi began before the Civil War, when trade and industry were pushing westward across the virgin prairies. Railroads were among the first to span the great waterway. Several bridges built in the early days still are in use.

SCHOOL IN A RAILWAY CAR STARTS ROUNDS IN ONTARIO

Children in Out-of-the Way Places Will Now Receive Instruction Once Each Month

EVERY boy and almost every girl loves a train. Now many of them go to school in one. In Northern Ontario there are many miles of country, few people and no schools. The territory is so vast that it has not been worth while to put up a school anywhere because the children who could attend it are scattered and there is no large central town.

The question of how children in such territories may be educated has been a problem for some time and only recently it has been solved. The Provincial Government of Ontario, in cooperation with the Canadian Pacific Railway, is giving the children a school house on wheels. The territory into which this train should go was selected by the Department of Education after making a thorough survey of the educational needs of the North. Should the experiment prove successful other traveling schools will be provided for remote districts.

In the traveling school that has now begun its rounds into hitherto scholastically unbeaten paths half a car is devoted to the school room. This is fitted with desks for the children, a blackboard and all the necessary equipment of a class room. The teacher has his own kitchen and sleeping quarters, fitted up in a small compact space.

The car will stop at about six communities during the month; each stop will be from three to six days. The teacher will give sufficient homework to keep the pupils busy in his absence, the car returning in the course of a month.

Fifty children will be accommodated in this first school on wheels.

CIRCULATING LIBRARY IN GERMANY REQUIRES REVIEWS OF ITS READERS

A UNIQUE type of circulating library is being tried in Germany. Before a book can be returned a review of it must be written by the reader. A patron, taking out a book, is given a blank, to be filled in with the patron's comment. These reviews are carefully arranged and analyzed. Charts are prepared, forming a valuable index for the librarians.

Under this system it is a simple matter to determine the subjects most in demand by the reading public or by special groups. The director of one of the libraries will be able ten years from now, by looking at his charts, to tell the subjects in which, for instance, women between the ages of 18 and 25 were most interested in 1926.

At the moment biographies are most popular in Germany, particularly the biographies of women. Next come histories of Europe, which are widely read all over the Continent. The popularly written scientific book, so eagerly read in America, is less in demand in Europe. If the European wants philosophy, economics or psychology he prefers the highly technical form.

Translations of American writers are more widely read in Europe than are those of European writers here. In remote sections of Russia, the Balkans and the Dalmatians, the boyhood days of many men were enlivened by Fenimore Cooper. In one town in the Dalmatians, about twenty years ago, Indian warfare, waged by the children of the vicinity as a result of reading the "Leatherstocking Tales," so terrified the countryside that the authorities were obliged to forbid this pastime.

Geographical and topographical facts regarding the United States are frequently more familiar to Europeans than to Americans. A physician in Yugoslavia discusses, with much intimate detail, the towns of a State in the Middle West and gives accurately the altitude of American mountain ranges, river sources—even the preponderance of certain nationalities in Pittsburgh or Kansas City. Yet the physician has never visited this country.

American political campaigns arouse much interest abroad. One may be told by a Frenchman, a Swiss or a German the exact figures of the majority by which a President or Governor was elected several years ago.
